One morning a child ran across the track safely, a short distance ahead of the car, when his father called him back, and he became frightened, and in trying to recross the track, he was caught under the car-wheels, and killed. This accident proved the exciting cause for a riot, whose object was to destroy the railway, together with the power-house; its real cause, no doubt, being the continued drought. The rioters, stoned the motormen and conductors of the two cars on the road till they were obliged to flee for safety; then they wrecked one car, battered another to pieces, and set it on fire. They then started to demolish the power-house, but were finally prevented from doing any more damage by the authorities. However, as these were so slow to act, the Japanese motor-men refused to return to their work, unless protected by Japanese police, which the Korean company could not well allow, so things have come to a stand-still. The motor-men have returned to Japan, and American motor-men will be employed.

Daniel in the Den of Lions

S. S. Lesson for July 30. Dan. 6: 10-23

Golden Text, Psalms 121: 5

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

In accordance with Nebuchadnezzar's dream (Dan. 2), the deterioration of the great image had commenced. The "head of gold" had given place to the "breast and arms of silver;" the great Babylonian Empire had ceased to be; and "Darius, the Mede received the kingdom" (R. V). The Authorized Version says "took." Both renderings are needed to express the true signification. Nebuchadnezzar, in his testimony to the whole known world had said: "The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will." Darius received the kingdom by the will of God, although instrumentally by the power of his army. How far he did so consciously, we cannot tell, but the fact of his recognizing the promotion of Daniel, who had interpreted to Belshazzar the handwriting on the wall, manifested a mind open to the fear of God.

Darius was reverent, but not superstitious. In the regulation of the new and important territory which had come under his command, he acted in the fear of God, when he chose his servant Daniel to be the chief of the three presidents who had command over all the inferior chiefs throughout his vast dominions. Daniel was preferred, or distinguished "above the presidents and the satraps, because an excellent spirit was in him: and the king thought to set him over the whole realm."

But Daniel was not to have an easy time of it. He was growing an old man: according to the course of nature, his time for active work would be drawing to an end. But just when the mental and physical powers begin to decline, there is often in advanced and ripened saints such an absence of self, such an entire dependence on the direct guidance of God, that his power is more manifest through their very weakness, than can be the case when he was an instrument whose own powers are in full exercise. "My strength is made perfect in weakness" (II. Cor. 12: 9), is a truth which was proved in many Old Testament men before it became a law of the New Testament.

Daniel had his enemies just because an excellent spirit was found in him. These men sought to find "occasion against Daniel as touching the kingdom: but they could find no occasion nor fault: forasmuch as he was faithful, neither was there any error or fault found in him." Were they not ashamed? No! Daniel's very faultlessness made him in their eyes all the more guilty. He stood in their way: this was his one great offence; and irrespective of his fitness or unfitness for office, they were determined to work his downfall. The only possible fault which they would find in him was concerning his God. But Darius was favorably impressed with the God of Daniel: how then take sides against him? They devised a plan which would minister to the pride of Darius in his high position, and represented to him that it would be for the establishment of his empire that no man make a petition, whatsoever of any god or man for thirty days save of the king himself. To a heathen king this was most plausible: and not seeing the trap which was laid for him, he fell into the snare. And the president and princes thinking they had all their own way, obtained the king's signature which by the law would not be reversed: and now made sure of the fall of Daniel. They reckoned, and not wrongly, on Daniel's loyalty to his God. What an honor for Daniel! And they waited eagerly for the moment when they should be able to prove that his service of God was high treason to his king. Daniel had one thing to do: it was to serve his God: fearing him he had nothing else to fear, and therefore, with open windows, where his enemies could see him, he knelt upon his knees three times a day and regulated his day with God in praise and prayer as always. Death or life, his communion with God must not cease: for this was more to him than life itself.

With wicked, hellish joy they perceived that Daniel's faithfulness to his God had stood this test; why were they not ashamed and broken-hearted? Because they had sold themselves to the demon of jealousy which possessed them, and they were not free men: "To whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey" (Rom. 6: 16). The miserable men, more by far to be pitied than Daniel, were bondslaves to their dishonorable, unworthy self-worship. They went eagerly, and told the king how his favorite disregarded his edict, and continued to pray three times a day to his God as he did before. Then Darius saw that he was in the power of these men, and he sought in vain to deliver his valued friend and adviser. But the great king was powerless, bound by his own signature of the edict to give command for Daniel to be cast into the den of lions, the penalty for disobedience mentioned in the edict.

But all was not yet over: where the greatest of earth's kings was powerless, the King of kings was mighty still, and, as far as his light went Darius put himself on the side of God: he was present when Daniel was cast into the den of lions, and said publicly: "Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee." Thus Darius began in this time of sore trouble to believe for himself in Daniel's God. No sleep that night for the king: probably Daniel slept well. Early in the morning Darius went in haste to the den, and cried with a lamentable voice, "O Daniel, servant of the living God, is thy God, whom thou servest continually, able to deliver thee from the lions?" "O king, live forever," came in clear tones from the bottom of the den. "My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, and they have not hurt me; forasmuch as before him innocency was found in me; and also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt." And Darius knew that it was safe to trust Daniel's God.

Lesson Points

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

FIERCE trial was needed to complete the picture given in the book of Daniel, of the prophet's faithfulness, and intrepidity. Daniel is represented as in continual prosperity, whether under Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar or Darius. In the fiery furnace, it is his three friends who witness for God. Daniel escapes all persecution and suffering. But the people, for whom the book was written, were in circumstances of great peril, and were put to the dreadful alternative of denying God, or being put to a cruel death. They needed encouragement to be faithful in the direst peril, and so the incident which forms the subject of the lesson was related. It has all the thrilling, dramatic quality of the other narratives in the book. Like the story of Ahasuerus and Haman in the book of Esther, and of Herod and Salome, in the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, it is the story of an absolute king entrapped, and held by his own edict. That the princes of the empire would be exasperated at seeing a member of a subject race, raised to the highest post in the government, might be expected, especially if, as the narrative implies, Daniel's duties would include a supervision of their own conduct. They would naturally desire his downfall, but how to compass it, was a difficult problem. In no part of his administration was he vulnerable. It was characterized throughout by strict integrity. The only hope of undermining his position was in religion. We can imagine that in such a juncture, religion would be a crucial subject. If Darius was a follower of Zoroaster he would hold the gold and silver idols of the Babylonians in contempt, for Zoroaster permitted no worship of images, and taught the infinite supremacy of one Spirit over all created beings. If Darius contemplated an attempt to break down idolatry in Babylon, the suggestion of the nobles of an edict which would suspend all prayers for a period of thirty days might be viewed with favor by the king as a means of accomplishing his purpose. His ready acquiescence in the proposal seems to imply some such project in his mind. That he should have accepted the suggestion and registered the edict, without consulting his chief advisor, is surprising, unless it presented itself to him as a means of carrying out a purpose already formed and discussed. In any case, he did accept it, and only after it was too late, did he realize that it would operate against Daniel, as well as against the Babylonian idolaters. He appears to have submitted his quandary to his supreme court, but without obtaining any relief. Then he yielded, though it seems strange that a king who could issue an edict, such as that which he issued after the miracle should not before the miracle have cut the red tape by which he was bound.

Able to deliver thee from the lions. David Livingstone was once in the grip of a lion, and to the end of his life suffered from the injury to his shoulder that the lion's teeth inflicted. "In going around the base of a hill," he says, "we saw a lion sitting on a rock right ahead. A bush intervened, and crouching behind the bush, I took steady aim and fired both barrels. 'He is shot! He is shot!' the men cried out. I bade them wait beside me till I had loaded again. In the act of ramming the piece, I heard a warning cry, and, looking half round, I saw the lion in the act of springing upon me. He caught me by the shoulder and we both came to the ground together. Growling horribly, he shook me as a terrier does a rat." The lion was trying to drag him away, when a well-directed shot from one of the men finished him, and the great explorer's life was saved.

They have not hurt me. The story is told of a boy in a large boarding school who, during one of his vacations at home, was converted. It was easy to kneel down in his quiet chamber and pray, but as he was returning to school, he realized what it would be to kneel down in that big dormitory in which there were twenty boys, all romping and wrestling and laughing. He felt that to pray there demanded more courage than he had. He offered a silent prayer to God for help. As he did so, feeling sure that God heard him, the thought occurred to him that he might get into bed and say his prayer there where he would not be noticed. But that was not witnessing for Christ and he rejected the idea. All day the thought of his ordeal was on his mind, but the more he thought of it, the more determined he was to go through it. Bedtime came at last, and he went up-stairs. The room was more noisy on that first night of the term than usual. He felt his face pale, and his knees shook for a moment. Then, to a few companions near him, he told of the change that had occurred, and quietly knelt down by his bedside. Instantly a hush fell on the room. Not one boy spoke. The kneeling boy could not understand the silence, but it was better than the ridicule he expected. The next night two other boys confessed to him that they had promised to pray every night but had not the courage. Now that they had seen him do it, they would keep their promise, and they did.

Cast him into the den of lions. A traveler in Morocco describes the lions' den as he saw it in that country, and he says that the emperor more than once fed the lions with living men, who were thrown in. It consisted of two large subterranean chambers, divided by a strong partition of iron bars in which there was a gate, which did not open and close on hinges, but was drawn up by ropes from above, sliding in a groove. The lions were coaxed by food into one of the chambers, and then the door was let down, and the empty chamber was cleaned. More food was put there and the gate again opened. The whole den was opened to the sky, and surrounded with low walls from which the people could look down at the animals.

Belgium's Crisis

DISORDER, threatening to become revolution, reigned throughout the little kingdom of Belgium for several days last week. In Brussels, the capital, crowds paraded the streets hurling stones at the residences of prominent statesmen and denouncing the government. In many streets the paving-stones were torn up to make barricades and the police were furiously assailed. It was necessary to call out the military to suppress the rioters. In the open space in front of the city hall the soldiers were compelled to fire with ball-cartridges and several persons were killed. In other towns, notably at Liege, Alost, Verviers, Antwerp and Ghent, mass-meetings were held and scenes of violence were reported. Inside the House of Parliament, free fights took place, the socialist deputies struggling wildly to reach the Premier, M. Van Den Peereboom, who would undoubtedly have been severely handled if his opponents could have reached him. His announcement that an obnoxious bill was withdrawn, has produced a lull in the rioting inside and outside the Chamber of Deputies, but the people are in a sullen, angry mood, and being well organized under socialist leaders, are liable to resume hostilities if they are provoked. It is probable that if a general outbreak does occur, the monarchy will be swept away and Belgium will become a republic. The disturbance is the result of dissatisfaction over the franchise. The populace contends that it has been tricked by the Government. A bill was passed six years ago which ostensibly gave manhood suffrage, but it contained a clause giving extra votes for education and property qualifications, so that while an ordinary working-man deposited one vote on polling-day, the clerical or aristocratic voter might deposit two or three. There was besides, a shrewd system of apportionment which worked to the advantage of the upper classes. As a result of the combined systems, the Socialists and Liberals, who numbered at the last election 936,237, have only forty members in the Chamber of Deputies, while the Clericals and Conservatives, who numbered 993,857, have 112. Discontent has been increasing on account of this unfairness, and at last the Premier introduced a bill professing to remedy the grievance. On examination it was found that the bill really made the matter worse, and then the people lost patience. Alarmed by the rioting, the Premier has withdrawn the bill, but the original grievance is still unrectified, and will remain a source of trouble until it is removed. The rioting of the past week shows that the people are in no mood to be trifled with. A fair concession would satisfy them if made now, but if a revolution should break out they might show a different spirit. The king and his ministers should heed the Preacher's warning:

Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad (Eccles. 7: 7).

A Snake in Church

A press dispatch from Shelbyville, Ind., reports an exciting incident which occurred on a recent Sunday evening, in a village about fifteen miles from that city. The congregation of the church had assembled for evening service and the exercises had begun, when a man occupying one of the front pews felt a peculiar motion in the neighborhood of his right leg. The church not being well lighted he could not see anything in the lower part of the pew, but presently he felt a pressure on the limb, which, as he well knew, was produced by the coil of a snake. He was afraid to move or call out lest there should be a panic in the congregation. He sat still until in the dim light he detected the glitter of two sparkling eyes, which showed where the head of the snake was. Instantly he planted his foot firmly on it and trod with all his weight. The snake writhed, but did not uncoil, though it was clearly in its death struggle. The man took a knife from his pocket and cut away at the coil around his leg until he had severed the body of the snake, when he took up the two pieces and carried them out of church. Several of the people saw what was in his hand, and soon every one present knew that a snake had been caught, and killed. An attempt was made to continue the service, but the people were too much agitated by the incident to pay attention, and all were glad when the minister closed the service prematurely and allowed them to leave the building. They were naturally uneasy, fearing that where one snake had penetrated there might be others. It may be hoped, for the sake of their comfort in the future that precautions may be taken against the entrance of the reptiles. There is still greater reason to watch against the intrusion of the great enemy of the race, who is compared in Scripture to a serpent, against whose subtlety there are special warnings.

Neither give place to the devil (Eph. 4: 27).

Seeking Fabulous Wealth

A number of residents of Long Island and Westchester County, N. Y., held a meeting recently in New York City and formed an association to press their claims to the ownership of land in the lower part of the city on which the great office buildings have been erected. The land they claim is worth many millions of dollars. The majority of the claimants are very poor people and are chiefly from the country districts. They belong to old families whose names were once among the most honored of the Dutch and English settlers of Manhattan. Their ancestors had no idea of the value their estates would ultimately attain and estimated their worth chiefly as grazing lands. If they could have foreseen the enormous price that would be paid for a few square yards, they would have been more careful about registering their titles and more reluctant to sell them. As it is, the courts decided, more than half a century ago, to entertain no more claims from the descendants of the original owners. Notwithstanding this decision, associations like the one recently organized in New York have been formed in the West and South, one of which has now six hundred members. They pay their assessments for legal expenses and meet at intervals to receive reports of the investigations which are being made among the city's archives. There is, however, no possibility of their ever establishing their claims to the property. It is a great pity that these people, who are poor, should be led to deny themselves and make sacrifices in a cause so hopeless. If, instead of listening to men who delude them with false hopes, they would give ear to the Gospel invitation, they might inherit possessions which will endure long after all worldly estates are worthless.

To an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you (1 Peter 1: 4).

A Professional Hostess

A novel method of getting a living is described by the correspondent of a New York daily journal. It is that of a lady, who, for three or five dollars will manage an entertainment, a wedding-breakfast, a large luncheon, or a dinner-party. She knows exactly how such matters ought to be conducted, and will see to all the arrangements, leaving the hostess free to give all her attention to her guests. On being notified that her services will be required, she consults the hostess as to the scale of the entertainment, and then takes all trouble off her hands. She instructs the servants, arranges with caterers, and engages additional help if it is needed. An hour before the meal is served, she appears in the dining-room and sees that the table is properly laid. Then, as the guests file in, she stations herself outside the door to inspect the dishes before they are carried in, and ascertains that each is on time, and in exactly the condition that it ought to be in. Under her expert management everything works smoothly, and there are none of the blunders or catastrophes, the dread of which otherwise might be a misery to the hostess. The lady describes herself as an anxiety-bearer. The people who profit by her services are a very small class compared with those who have anxieties of other kinds which are a heavy burden to them. But for them there is a provision in the person of One who careth for them.

Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee (Ps. 55: 22).

The Burned Steamer

The captain and crew of the Clyde Line freight steamer Pawnee have had a narrow escape from a terrible death. It was on its way from Brunswick, Ga., to New York, with a cargo of cotton and lumber, when on June 25, fire was discovered in the hold. An examination showed that the flames had gained such headway that it was impossible to save the ship. The captain therefore ordered the boats lowered and the crew to take their places in them. While this was being done, the captain went to his cabin for some valuables which he hoped to save. When he reached the ship's side the boat containing the crew had drifted out of reach. The crew made several vain efforts to get back to the ship, first to one side of the vessel and then to the other in attempts to remove the captain. Finally Captain Ingram leaped into the water and swam 200 feet or more toward the boat. One of the crew held out an oar to him and pulled him in. He was completely exhausted and almost unconscious. In the meantime, the George W. Clyde had sighted the Pawnee and bore down upon her in time to pick up the captain and crew of the burning ship. It is a matter for thankfulness that all were saved. It has often happened in such emergencies, that men making an effort to save their property, as the captain did, have lost their lives. Still more frequently, the concern for their possessions has caused men to lose their souls, though earnest endeavors to save them, such as the crew made to save their captain are made by their ministers and Christian friends.

Christian Endeavor's Mighty Host

The Huge International Convention, at Detroit, Specially Photographed for this Journal — The Immense Progress of a Year — Dr. Clark's Annual Message

OUR readers who belong to the Christian Endeavor Society will be glad to see the pictures of the great Convention just held at Detroit, Mich., which are reproduced on these pages from photographs taken specially for The Christian Herald. Three weeks ago we published a sketch of the programme, with portraits of the leaders of the Committees appointed to extend Detroit's hospitality to the thousands of guests and a picture of the Convention headquarters. The programme as then outlined was faithfully carried out and the eighteenth Convention takes its place in history as one of the most successful of the long line.

The interest of the Convention naturally concentrated in the message of President Clark and the report of General-Secretary Baer, which, as usual, presented in concise form the record of progress during the past year and the suggestions for future development. In both there were indications that the Christian Endeavor Society, in spite of sinister predictions of decadence, is very much alive and has lost none of its old-time energy in planning for new work. Both the President and Secretary were full of enthusiasm and the jubilant note predominant in their addresses met a full response from the thousands of members who listened to them. It was a welcome surprise to hear from Mr. Baer that, although at the beginning of the year it appeared that the movement had spread to every section of the country and into many foreign lands, the year had witnessed the birth of an immense number of new societies. After dropping from the rolls all the societies which, from a variety of causes have ceased to exist, there is a net gain in the number of societies of two thousand, and in number of members, a net gain of over one hundred thousand. The total number of societies in the United States is now 42,075 and in the world 55,813, and the aggregate membership is 3,350,000. Mr. Baer gave the list classified according to nationality, as follows: "Great Britain has over six thousand societies. Australia has over two thousand societies, and is represented in this convention by two delegates who have traveled over six thousand miles to bring greetings from our brothers and sisters under the Southern Cross. India has 454, China 148, Africa 136, Mexico 108, West Indies 103, Germany 101, Madagascar 93, Japan 73, and so on through a long list, which I must omit at this time, but cannot pass Spain, the country with whom we were at war last year. Spain, rent with war and turmoil, has more than held its own, for she has thirty-six societies."

The denominational classification of societies in the United States is thus given: "The Presbyterians are in the van with over eight thousand societies. The Congregationalists have over six thousand; the Disciples of Christ over four thousand; the Baptists over three thousand; then the Methodist Protestant, Cumberland Presbyterians, Lutherans, Reformed Dutch, and Methodist Episcopal, in order named, each with over one thousand societies. Then follow many evangelical denominations, in all, including those already named, nearly forty." No less interesting is it to learn that these denominations have all had reason to be thankful for the work of the society. During the past ten years they have received into Church membership from the ranks of the Christian Endeavor Societies the immense number of one million and a half. A better test of usefulness cannot well be conceived.

THE GREAT OPENING MEETING IN TENT WILLISTON

The President, affectionately styled, "Father Endeavor" Clark, with ministerial instinct, took the key-note of his address from a passage of Scripture. It was that in which the historian describes the development of the poet-warrior-king —II. Samuel 5: 10. He preferred the marginal rendering which records that David went on Going and Growing—"To merit the presence and guidance of the Lord God of Hosts," said Dr. Clark, "the Christian Endeavor movement must go and grow. 'Going,' stands for aggressive, out-reaching enterprise; 'growing,' for increase in grace, in power, and numerical strength." Dr. Clark was careful to distinguish between mere motion and true progress, and incidentally referred to the difficulty he had experienced in keeping the Society clear of fanatics, who wanted his endorsement of the wildest of wild-cat schemes to evangelize the world or revolutionize society."

Among the prominent suggestions of Dr. Clark for future development were. 1st. Almost every State, Province and Territory affords the opportunity of larger numerical growth. 2d. See that the younger Endeavorers go and grow. 3d. That local unions go and grow. 4th. That religion in the family become more and more a matter of serious concern. 5th. The earnest cultivation of the Evangelistic Missionary zeal. After telling the story of a man who by accident had had the skin stripped from his arm and could be cured only by skin-grafting—the skin for the purpose being voluntarily offered by twenty-seven members of a fraternal society, each of whom gave one square inch of cuticle—Dr. Clark spoke of the glory of self-sacrifice for the good of others and concluded his eloquent speech with the following thrilling words:

"Ah! brothers and sisters, by sacrificing ourselves alone can the world be saved. Flesh of our flesh, bone of our bone, life of our life, must be given. Our religion, our endeavor, is useless unless it teaches us this. We can neither go nor grow until we learn this lesson that he that saveth his life must lose it. This, please God, shall be the spirit of this Convention. This shall be the watchword of the nineteenth year of Christian Endeavor. Sacrifice and service, living and loving, praying and practising, going and growing, shall bring the victory."

At the last meeting Secretary Baer stated that the attendance at this Convention had very much exceeded that of any other Christian Endeavor Convention ever held in the matter of those present at the various meetings. The estimate of attendance at meetings gives a total of 298,500. There were 28,000 Endeavorers in attendance, including Detroit delegates, and 30,500 persons simultaneously attended Christian Endeavor meetings.

The Prestige of the Fathers

JUST [illegible] name and influence are providentially extending, it is well arranged that new emphasis should be given to the study of the story of the American Revolution. There is no end to the new historical series, personal or national which are in progress of publication. There is almost no end to the national societies that have been organized to make public and perpetuate the memory of the Continental Fathers.

The revival of the study of such themes, as shown in story and poem is seen, too, in history. Lord Trevelyan's work on The American Revolution is a work by itself. Perhaps it is the first successful effort of an Englishman to treat that American struggle with fairness and candor, as well as to rise to the height of its consequences, whether to Great Britain or to the other nations of the earth. When the American Revolution was over, a new era in civilization was established. We are willing to call it American. It must go with our flag into all parts of the world.

Now that this is so, it is well that we begin to study and emphasize ourselves anew. The Revolutionary struggle was of no private interpretation. One hundred and twenty-three years after the Declaration of Independence, we begin to see what interest the Philippines had in that struggle: what interest, perhaps, China, and the whole Orient. It is a tide that has no ebbing. It has, yet, to visit the whole earth.

Fruits of the Philippine Islands

COMPARED with the best European species, the fruits of the Philippine Islands are inferior. They cannot equal our grapes, peaches, cherries, strawberries. Indeed, it would seem to be the law in the tropics that they are distinguished for a few distinctive and peculiar fruits to be found nowhere else, while the fruits of the temperate zones are more various and satisfactory.

The mango ranks first in the Philippine Islands. It is oblong, oval-shaped, flattened on the sides, five inches long, and yellow when ripe. The Philippine mangoes are said to be superior to any elsewhere in the Orient. The trees are large, with majestic leaves, bark green, [illegible] and the fruit [illegible] and noble. To rear the fruit requires great care. The forced fruit is brought [illegible] it brings twelve and one-half cents each. The natural time of ripening is after the end of March. In the height of the season they can be bought for one dollar a hundred. Many persons eat as many as a dozen a day, as the fruit is considered perfectly harmless. Luzon and Cebu Islands appear to produce more mangoes than the rest of the Archipelago. From eight Mango trees, Foreman reports he got annually two pickings, and one year three pickings from two trees. We read of the tree of life that it "yields its fruit every month." The mango of the Philippine Islands is not equally prolific, but it illustrates the meaning of that verse. The heavenly paradise is more prolific than our new tropical possessions.

A Dog and His Master

A MAN, thirty-six years of age, who had been drinking, lately shot himself on Avon Avenue, Newark, N. J. His faithful dog was found watching by his lifeless body. The antithesis between a man created in God's image, who gets desperate because of the dominion of an evil habit, and throws up his commission, snuffs his life out as a candle, and his dog, who will not surrender his trust, even though his master is no longer living, is awfully suggestive.

We might almost reverse the Saviour's words: "How much is a brute better than a man!" Is man the great failure in creation? Is man the only being not true to creation's trust? What brute admits a thief into his mouth that steals away his brains? The dog knows his owner, even though stretched in death's silence by his own murderous hand. The dog still acknowledges the tie that binds him to man. Man forgets the tie that binds him to God; tramples it under foot; first destroys God's image in himself by strong drink, makes himself infuriate, and then blows out his brains; desecrates and destroys the temple where God takes up his residence. What a picture for a drinking man to look at, this group at the road side! We speak of a man's sinking himself below the brute. In such a comparison, which most bears the image of God, the master or the dog?

Conditional Benefactions

ANDREW CARNEGIE, whose name is becoming the synonym of beneficence, especially with relation to libraries, has made a conditional offer of $30,000 to the New York University. The method of beneficence seems to be peculiarly American. Dr. Pearson, of Chicago, has thus largely endowed many institutions in the West. He proposes to give so much if the friends of the institution will supplement it with a certain other amount. It is a stimulus to the effort all along the line. The conditional amount will be lost within a certain allotted time.

It might be said, that such giving is doubly blest: It blesses the giver, as such, and is the inspirer of other giving. The writer does not know the amount of Dr. Pearson's benefactions; still less does he know how much Dr. Pearson has inspired others to give. But, probably in no case less than one-half is given by the original donor. So that if in this case Mr. Carnegie should give $30,000, an additional sum of $30,000, to be contributed by the friends of the University, will be expected to be raised to supplement the original amount.

There is nothing more full of promise to the United States and her great future, than these benefactions of her wealthy citizens. The determination of Andrew Carnegie to be his own administrator will inspire others to go and do likewise. So that, presently, instead of eager relatives trying to break the wills of the dead, every dying man, who has anything to give, will transfer the gift directly to the new possessor without the law's delays and uncertainties.

The Drought Ended

[illegible] weeks, left farmers and gardens in an awful plight. At last the rains have come. We sometimes speak of famine; but with so large a territory as ours, with such rapid transportation, there is very little danger of it. The poor will suffer; the rich will go into the markets and buy at higher rates. People will fall back upon canned vegetables, and we shall get through the summer solstice. The caterpillars and the potato bugs will have fought a victorious battle. But, in the autumn, supplies will be equalized again, and anything like actual famine will have been averted. Man's dependence upon God, in nature, should lead him to deeper gratitude to Him for the rains that fall, and the streams that dash through the valleys. The rivers of God are full of water. The too exclusive study of the modes of His material working should not tempt us to forget that the varied seasons are by his arrangement; that the clouds gather their treasures of moisture at His bidding, and that His mercy averts from this favored nation those scenes of suffering and despair, with which less favored nations are afflicted.

Two Boy Criminals

TWO boys, aged respectively fourteen and ten, were lately arrested by Detective Pearson, of Jersey City, N. J., charged with placing an obstruction on a railroad in New Jersey. The obstruction consisted of a heavy piece of iron, and was discovered by the fireman just in time to prevent a disaster. The same boys, also, are accused of altering the signal lights along the line. The boys accused each other of the crime. They were admitted to bail.

Two things, doubtless, inspired these lads. First, idleness. Much is said against putting boys too early at work. There are some boys whose salvation consists in their being early employed. Their minds are active. They want something for their hands to do. If boys are not doing anything at school, be sure and give them something to do elsewhere. The old couplet still lives:

For idle hands to do.

The other source of temptation is printed, or oral accounts of boy-criminals. Precocity in crime inspires a like precocity. There are boy-books, magazines and newspapers, illustrated with pictures, in which, perhaps, these very boys will figure as hero examples to others. Perhaps this very item will be circumstantially written up and sold to boys, to stimulate their imagination and awaken their ambition to do similar deeds. There is no such active seed-sower as the being who sows tares. There is no surer harvest than a harvest of tares. That man is a benefactor who saves one boy from becoming a criminal: who puts him into an environment where he may become a man.

Caring for Cuba's Orphans

The Lee Orphan Asylum, in Havana, which was established in the exciting times immediately preceding the Spanish-American war, and supported by the generosity of the readers of this journal ever since, has now been formally transferred by General Lee to the civil authorities of Havana. In announcing the change, General Lee writes as follows:

"The Orphan Asylum will maintain its name and preserve its separate organization. Everything now there is in fine condition. The children all look clean. It is admirably managed by Miss Amada Miranda."

Our readers, whose timely aid to the orphanage made its existence possible during the war, and thus was the means of saving the lives of hundreds of little reconcentrado orphans, will be gratified to learn that the work is so highly thought of by the Havana authorities that it is to be continued at the public expense. Few orphanages in any land have had such an eventful history, and few have been the means of so much blessing.

A Presbyterian teacher who has been laboring in Utah, having formerly been a missionary in India, is reported by the Evangelist as saying that before she went to Utah she believed that there were no women in all the world so miserable as the women of India, but she has changed her opinion since making the acquaintance of the victims of Mormon oppression and cruelty.

The revival meetings, in the Gospel tent, "Glad Tidings," on Broadway and Fifty-sixth street, New York, which have now been in progress a month, are still largely attended, and Evangelist S. Hartwell Pratt, in charge of arrangements, reports many professions of conversion. It is proposed to continue the meetings until the latter part of September or early in October.

Rev. P. W. Pitcher, writing from Amoy, China, says that in that mission there are 1,315 native members. Their contributions for 1898 were $6,174, an average of nearly five dollars per member. As Mr. Pitcher points out, five dollars is a larger gift from these poor people than double or treble the amount from us. That they should give so much is good evidence of their sincerity.

At the recent meeting of the Zionist Federation, Sir Francis Montefiore said that the soil of Palestine was admirably adapted for raising barley, wheat, and other cereals, while the almond, the citron, and the vine could also be profitably grown. If the harbors of the country were improved, its commercial resources would soon be developed, and there was ample room for a population ten times greater than the present.

George Alexander, D. D., went to Ocean Grove last week to formally take possession of the property.

Rev. D. M. Heydrick, of the Brooklyn City Mission, is giving the children of the City Orphan Asylum a day's outing to Rockaway Beach as often as funds are supplied him for the purpose. The railway companies have kindly facilitated him by giving cars at reduced rates. The children and converts of Bethlehem Mission, which is under Mr. Heydrick's superintendence, have also enjoyed a day's outing. Mr. Heydrick would be glad to extend this work if money were contributed for the purpose. His address is 500 Dean street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

Bringing Children to Jesus

I think when I read that sweet story of old,
When Jesus was here among men,
How he called little children as lambs to his fold,
I should like to have been with him then.

"BRINGING the children to Jesus!" Poets, prose-writers, sculptors, painters, of every clime, of every form of Christian faith, and of no professed religious belief, have chosen this subject as a favorite theme for pen, chisel, and brush. The truth is, there is no story in history, sacred or profane, so beautiful as that of Jesus. The history of Jesus fits into family and home-life as does no other. Jesus, as Mary's little baby, in the manger among the patient cattle; Jesus carried by his parents into Egypt; Jesus talking about his Father to doctors in the temple, amazing them with a little child's knowledge of holy things; Jesus, the carpenter's Son, obedient to his parents, helping Joseph at his trade; Jesus, the beloved guest at the home in Bethany, entering into its joys and sorrows, settling little differences between the sisters; Jesus at meat in this house or that, eating with publicans and sinners, or breaking bread with his little group of disciples; Jesus entering homes of sickness and death with comfort and help in his voice and touch; Jesus raising the widow's son, weeping with Martha and Mary for Lazarus, never too busy, never too tired to listen pitifully and helpfully to any story of sin or woe; Jesus, in his death agony, leaving his mother to the consolation and care of John, "the beloved disciple." Jesus after resurrection, blessing the bread at the supper in Emmaus, partaking of the little feast of fish on the shore with his fishermen; all these are dear, simple, precious pictures in the hearts and minds of all who have read the New Testament. Place any of them beside those of Mohammed riding into Constantinople through blood to his horse's saddle-girth; or beside Buddha, leaving his sleeping wife and child for a life of asceticism, and we will not wonder why the home-life of the Christian is purer, sweeter and nobler than that of the followers of the best and purest of pagan beliefs.

The picture on this page is an exquisite sermon. A little one nestles in the dear Lord's arms; another, her hand in his, looks up confidingly; on every childish face in that humble peasant's home is reverence, wondering awe, and love that claims and understands the Master and his love for children—no fear in any face, only trust absolute and perfect. We look and think, "Except ye become as a little child, ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." All the working-folk have heard that the dear Master is there; they come, bringing their little ones; the rough laborer, the good teacher of the village school, and the faithful pastor who have been telling the children about Jesus, are there. Mark, how the elders stand back reverently, letting the innocent little ones, the "pure in heart" go up first to the Master, the tired, gentle, pure Master, who has neither silver nor gold to give—only his love, more precious than all the gold and silver of the world! Jesus in the flesh is not on earth to-day, but in the spirit he is always with us, and by our lives, by our walk, by telling about him, we may bring the childen to Jesus now, just as truly as did the mothers of Judea, and he will bless them as truly as he did of old. Mothers, trying to raise your children aright; good pastors and Sunday School workers, and faithful teachers in public schools, kind, prayerful helpers in our fresh-air work for the waifs of the slums; you are bringing children to Jesus and Jesus is as faithful now, to-day, in America, as he was twenty centuries ago in Judea.

The Duty of Gladness

"Thou shalt rejoice in every good thing which the Lord thy God hath given unto thee and unto thy house." Take a concordance and see how many times the word "rejoice" is found in the Bible. How often do we think over it that the command to rejoice is laid upon us? If you have youth and strength rejoice and be glad; if you have age and wisdom, again rejoice; if you have little children, rejoice because of them and with them, and teach them by precept and example the duty of gladness. If you are weary and heavy-laden, cast your sorrows upon the great Burden-bearer, and rejoice that "he careth for you." Let us, in the meridian of our years and strength, make our righteousness and faith so sure and beautiful and joyous that youth will hunger and thirst after it.

Palestine's New Order of Women

The Jerusalem News says that an Israelitish order of women has been started in Palestine whose members will devote their lives exclusively to the service of mercy. Only young women and girls will be accepted. They vow to give all their time to the nursing of the sick and education of children. This order will not confine itself to Palestine, but will extend to all Jewish communities in the world. The sisters will live strictly according to the commandments of the Jewish religion, and will make no distinction between people in the matter of religion, in the exercises of their philanthropic work. For an emblem they have chosen the Star of David, and for a device the word Zion.

Life's Evening Fair

One of our readers, Mrs. Rhoda, of Concord, Wisconsin, in a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, gives this cheery sketch of a happy anniversary in the life of an aged lady.

July 1, 1899, Mrs. Frances Williams, of Concord, Wis., celebrated her eighty-ninth birthday. An informal reception was held during the day, many friends calling, and congratulating her. Mrs. Dew, her daughter-in-law, with whom she makes her home, gave a five-o'clock tea. The table decorations were carnations. Many gifts were tendered Mrs. Williams, who is truly a remarkable lady. In possession of all her faculties, interested in all the great affairs of the day, a fervent Christian woman, a member of the Missionary Society, and an earnest worker for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

It grieved him [illegible]
To say a cross word was a cause for ruth,
And all the world was void of light and song,

Your mother's God for comfort and for light
When you are faint or erring, sad, or weak?

Your head's soft pressure, as in long ago,
And catch the whisper: "Mamma, I can't rest Until I say my prayers—and let God know."

"God's Temple"

ETTA LANSING WENTZ, a specialist in physical culture, says in a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I would suggest to mothers individually and to all Mothers' Clubs and Mothers' Meetings the following as subjects for consideration: 1. Physical Education: what it is, what it does; 2. Personal Deformities; 3. Physical Danger Signals; 4. The Mental Effect of Physical Training; 5. The Moral Effect of Physical Training; 6. The Outer, a Manifestation of the Inner.

No mother can afford to neglect these matters either for herself or her children. The great and wise from ancient times till now have emphasized the importance of training and developing the body—God's image unto honor and grace. "The life is not to live, but to be well."—Sterne. "To train the mind and neglect the body is to produce a cripple." Plato. "No perfect brain ever crowns an imperfectly developed body." Clark. It is now generally recognized that Moses, the great lawgiver of Israel, gave more abundant, wise and pious attention to the laws of health than the average man now living bestows upon them.

If we consider the body as God's temple, it is manifestly our duty to do all that in us lies to make it strong, straight and healthy. We shall look, too, upon our children as little temples for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, and train them to so regard themselves. Say to your child: "You are God's temple, dear. You must have only holy and beautiful thoughts; any other would be unfit for such an abode. And you must keep your little face and hands clean and sweet, and your little feet must go in no evil places. Your body is too sacred." We all know how the "inner manifests itself in the outer;" we have all seen plain faces grow beautiful because of the reflected grace of the lovely spirit within that continually held communion with the God of love and light. Every child wants to be pretty; tell the little ones how to find and show forth the true unfailing beauty. Nannie bends over her book until the "postural deformity" of a round back and stooped shoulders threaten her. Tell her she is desecrating God's temple; and that it would be sacred service to make herself tall, straight and shapely as a young column—a monument to her Creator. These plans have been tried on children, and have worked reform. Physical education that impresses upon the child a due sense of the sacredness of his body as God's handiwork, will be a safeguard and inspiration all his life.

Our Daily Work

Plans in Life—The Beauty of Moderation—People who Risk Everything—The Wise Worker

TO have some daily work that we must do, and do to our uttermost, is a means of grace as well as happiness; for only by real work can we come in contact with facts, and retain our moral health. Work is the backbone of character and no one can keep erect without it. But it is also essential that it should be work which suits our nature—work which we can do—work, whose legitimate success will be a constant happiness to us. And it depends greatly on ourselves, whether our daily work is a curse or a blessing. Avarice, folly, mistaken vocations, etc., may turn work into a drudgery, and the workman into a slave. Lamb and Coleridge found red tape to be fetters of iron; and uncongenial work galls a man, quite as much as a plough would gall a red stag of the mountains.

Then we must work in moderation. Rushing and pushing to excess, even when the object is good, crushes and stifles that fine spirit which should animate the whole. It is easy to say that pushing carries every thing before it. It does not. It has its limits. In the end independence of thought will master it. But since the "struggle for life" became a commonplace of science it has become a commonplace of social and business life. Mr. Charles Darwin has told us that all creation "pushes," and we push, and shout, and advertise ourselves just as all creation does. Every one asks for what he wants, and does his best to see that he gets it. "If you want to be asked anywhere, ask to be asked," said Thackeray; and his paradox has become a precept. Do the results justify us in this course. Struggle is one thing, but to enjoy the struggle, and to be happy in its results, is another. Let all be justified in their own minds. A man or woman who can "push," and yet find leisure for higher things, is only expressing an active business aptitudes. But what shall we say of those who rush through life, pushing and being pushed, splashing and being splashed, and who are so little sensible of their higher nature that they would give all the books between Homer and Kipling for a rise of twenty per cent.

Our work also should be like our diet, somewhat varied. We should certainly do one thing well, but a slavish serving of one purpose, or one effort, produces that narrowness of view, and that want of sympathy, which is the sin of specialists; all the more dangerous where the work is mechanical, instead of mental. It may be an economical thing for the manufacturer to have a score of men making one saddle; but when one man made the whole saddle, that mechanic was a whole man, and not the one-twentieth part of a man.

To be really happy in our daily work, we ought to have conceived some plan of life, and be working to carry it out to a successful end. This is a more complex thing than it seems, and requires the exercise of the most valuable attributes of humanity; especially of that rare quality—"looking before and after" which makes a man mark out a path, and hold to it steadily, until his object is crowned with success. In this struggle he must have exercised self-command and self-denial, have guarded his temper, kept the door of his lips, and pushed his plan to its end, with a patient, steady, perseverance, which is worthy of admiration.

Some people have no plans. They go on from day to day, and never say "to-morrow I will do this or that." This is a deficiency, and not a virtue. It is true they may be content, but contentment is too passive a virtue for this country. We have no right to be content in circumstances that can be improved; for we have no right to live only for ourselves. Better men and women would be planning new ways of doing good; they would be forming practical designs for increasing their influence; and for serving the people, and the causes they delight to serve and to love.

To think about the future and to plan for its welfare is always a prominent characteristic of those complete natures which win success. What they have done, they leave; it is what they are going to do that fills them with hope and enthusiasm, "pressing forward to that which is before," and which they have conceived on a more excellent and splendid plan. Thus, a good writer, one who feels all the responsibility and honor of his vocation, seldom regards the books he has written. It is the book he is going to write that fills his mind and his heart. People may wonder how it is possible for the mind to conceive and carry out some fine literary work, and then, when it is completed, turn immediately with unabated enthusiasm to a new effort. It is not at all wonderful. For a highly-organized mind is like a great ship which pursues its way, though the officers sleep by turns. Smaller minds have to lay-to altogether sometimes; but a great mind is always awake, always planning for something better in the future, always finding its rest in the very carrying out of its conceptions.

The way in which some people make a plan of life, and then work it out to the letter, is also a puzzle to those of vaguer views and more slip-shod tempers. Well, one of the secrets of their success is their reticence. They don't talk of their plans; they give them the benefit of that silence in which nature brings all her designs to perfection. They know that to talk of their projects, in the hour of their conception, is apt to make them shadows. The best of plans can be talked to death. Yet, there comes an hour when they may be advantageously confided—the hour which commits the plan to action.

This taking thought and planning are the antipodes of another business principle which is not without its followers—that of "risking things." Men who have this vanity have also the persuasion that exceptional skill or advantages belong to them, either of nature or right. They imagine they can defy general rules. They declare that all life is a risk—that we have our daily breath on trust—that the most guarded lives are haunted by fatal dangers and escapes. It is a rash and injurious temper, very likely to become a passion, and in the end unhinge the character quite as surely as a course of gambling.

Risks have to be taken; they are conditions inseparable from business and from mortal life; and it is quite easy to go to the other extreme and nourish a servile solicitude about what is safe and unsafe; a temper not only debasing to the mind, but unhealthy to the body. But there is always a choice in risks, in their nature and in the company in which they are to be taken. Certainly, when all possible combinations and probabilities have been computed, there will still be circumstances no one can foresee; yet risks may be accepted with hopeful cheerfulness, when brains and prudence and vigilance have done all possible to meet them advantageously. People who dispose of business or working probabilities by such rules as "ten to one," or "as likely as not," are not the kind of merchants or mechanics the apostle exhorted to be "diligent in business, serving the Lord." Letting things take their course, is not, even as a business precept, as wise and safe a rule as "committing our way unto the Lord," and trusting in him to pass our plans and desires. For, if they are wise and good plans, we may safely leave them to Omnipotent wisdom and care. Many of our greatest workers and merchants have done this, and found that the "blessing of the Lord it maketh rich and addeth no care or sorrow therewith."

We are not yet in that condition when men shall work and faint not: but whatever our place in the workshop of life, we did not come to that place by accident; it is the very place God meant for us, and, in performing its duties, we are performing the duties to which God called us. This circumstance alone gives dignity to the humblest work and the humblest life. At the longest, the working days of life are soon over; then it is God's work to make "the heavenly period perfect the earthen."

The Philosopher's Scales

(Republished by request of many subscribers)

WHAT were they? you ask you shall presently see,
These scales were not made to weigh sugar and tea.

Oh, no; for such properties wondrous had they,
That qualities, feeling and thoughts they could weigh,
Together with articles small or immense,
From mountains or planets to atoms of sense.
Naught was there so bulky, but there it could lay,
And naught so ethereal, but there it would stay;
And naught so reluctant, but in it must go:
All which some examples more clearly will show.

The first thing he tried was the head of Voltaire,
Which retained all the wit that had ever been there;
As a weight, he threw in a torn scrap of a leaf
Containing the prayer of the penitent thief;
When the skull rose aloft with so sudden a spell,
As to bound like a ball on the roof of his cell.

Next time he put in Alexander the Great,
With a garment that Dorcas had made, for a weight;
And though clad in armor from sandals to crown,
The hero rose up, and the garments went down.
A long row of almshouses, amply endowed
By a well-esteemed Pharisee, busy and proud,
Now loaded our scale, while the other was pressed
By those mites the poor widow dropped into the chest;
Up flew the endowment, not weighing an ounce,
And down, down, the farthing's worth came with a bounce.

By further experiment (no matter how),
He found that ten chariots weighed less than one plow;
A sword, with gilt trappings, rose up in the scale,
Though balanced by only a tenpenny nail;
A lord and a lady went up at full sail,
When a bee chanced to light on the opposite scale.

Ten doctors, ten lawyers, two courtiers, one earl,
Ten counselors' wigs full of powder and curl,
All heaped in one balance, and swinging from thence,
Weighed less than some atoms of candor and sense;
And not mountains of silver and gold would suffice,
One pearl to outweigh 'twas the "pearl of great price!"

At last the whole world was bowled in at the grate,
With the soul of a beggar to serve for a weight:
When the former sprung up with so strong a rebuff
That it made a vast rent and escaped at the roof,
While the scale with the soul in 't so mightily fell
That it jerked the philosopher out of his cell.

The Conference at Northfield

Mr. D. L. Moody, the evangelist, writing from East Northfield, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, gives this interesting outline of the programme of the Summer Conference:

"I have not seen lately a more refreshing and encouraging sight than the Conference of Young Men, now in session at Northfield. There are about 600 student delegates in attendance (eighty-four from Yale alone), and the Holy Spirit is moving among them mightily. The Young Women's Conference, which opened July 14, bids fair to rival it in attendance and power. Over 400 delegates have already registered—the largest number in the history of the movement. Mr. Robert E. Speer, who has been received by the men with the utmost enthusiasm, is to speak every day at the Young Women's Conference, besides conducting a daily Bible Class, in the study of the Gospel of John. Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall, of New York, and Rev. Teunis S. Hamlin, D.D., of Washington, are also among the speakers.

"Now this Conference is open to the whole Christian public, and arrangements have been made, so that whether visitors come alone or with friends, good accommodations will be found, and at very small expense. It will be a wonderful opportunity for a spiritual uplift and blessing. I hope pastors will make a special effort to bring it to the attention of the young women of their churches."

Found Wealth in the Bible

A poor shepherd purchased from a dealer in old clothes, an old Bible. As he was turning over the leaves, he noticed several pasted together. He separated them and was greatly surprised when he found, carefully enclosed, a bank-bill of five hundred francs ($100). On the margin of a page was written: "I gathered this money with great difficulty, but having no heirs but those who need nothing, I make whosoever shall read this Bible, my heir."

"Better Be Wise Than Rich."

Wise people are also rich when they know a perfect remedy for all annoying diseases of the blood, kidneys, liver and bowels. It is Hood's Sarsaparilla, which is perfect in its action—so regulates the entire system as to bring vigorous health.

Bishop Newman Dead

The Famous Methodist Episcopal Preacher Closes His Long and Eventful Career

THE Methodist Episcopal Church has lost one of its most prominent leaders by the death of Bishop John P. Newman, which occurred on July 5 at Saratoga, N. Y. The bishop, who was in his seventy-third year, had been in failing health for some months, but it was not until July 2 that serious apprehension was entertained of fatal termination to his illness. On that day he became unconscious and did not recover his senses until a few minutes before his death. He was then unable to speak, but he recognized his beloved wife, who sat beside him

His life had been an eventful one. His intimate personal friendship with Gen. Grant, beginning in Washington during Grant's Presidency and continuing down to the last sad scene at Mount McGregor, brought Dr. Newman into association with the political leaders of the time and gave him a circle of acquaintance very different from that of the ordinary minister. That Dr. Newman was appreciated in that society and that he made his influence felt there and that he was in some measure affected by his associations, accounts for the attitude many of his brethren in the ministry adopted toward him. Of his abilities as an orator and his power as an administrator, there could never be any doubt. He was a most impressive speaker and when his subject touched his heart, as when standing by the casket of some illustrious friend, he pronounced a eulogy on the character and services of the departed, his eloquence thrilled every hearer. It came so obviously from a heart warm, and tender and faithful and showed the depth of affection there was in his nature.

The bishop was a native of New York. His conversion occurred when he was sixteen years of age. It was the result of the personal solicitude of a stranger. This man noticing the fine intelligent face and manly bearing of the lad, laid his hand on his shoulder as he passed him on the street and said, "God wants your heart." He said no more and passed on. But he met the boy again on the following Sunday, and without a word of greeting, put a slip of paper in his hand, and immediately turned away. Young Newman looked at the paper and read the same words, "God wants your heart." The words rang in his ears for days, and finally impelled him to pray and go to church. He yielded his heart to God and became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His thoughts, as was natural in a youth constituted as he was, turned to the ministry. He entered Cazenovia Seminary, intending to proceed thence to Wesleyan, but on his graduation from the former institution, the way to immediate service opened so plainly that he decided, on the advice of his friends, to dispense with a college education.

At the early age of twenty-two he was received into the Oneida Conference. After seven years' labor in various churches he was transferred to the Troy Conference, and thence to New York, where he occupied the pulpit of the Bedford Street Church. At the close of his term there, an opportunity occurred for a trip to the Orient. Dr. Newman spent some time in the Holy Land and, on his return published his famous book, From Dan to Beersheba. He was assigned to the Washington Square Church, in New York, labored there for one year, at the end of which, at the request of Bishop Ames, he accepted a commission to go to the South to reorganize the Methodist Church in that region. It was an arduous and a difficult task which must have taxed his energies. In 1869 he organized the Metropolitan Memorial Church, in Washington, D. C., where he had President Grant, the Chief Justice, and many of the most prominent statesmen among his hearers. He was made chaplain of the senate, and at the close of his term, received from President Grant a commission as inspector of United States Consulates, which gave him an opportunity of foreign travel. His tour occupied two years, and on his return he again occupied the Metropolitan pulpit. In 1878, he returned to New York with an appointment to the Central Church. Subsequently, he accepted the temporary pastorate of a Congregational Church, which, however, proved an uncongenial experience. He had not severed his relations with the Methodist Episcopal Communion, and in 1886, he again became pastor of the Metropolitan Church in Washington, where he remained until May, 1888, when the General Conference elected him to the episcopate.

Luke 10: 38-42

WHEN we reflect on what Christ was and how his infinite vision of life surpasses all that the wisest of men can know of it, his remark to Martha will be seen to have in it a personal message of the utmost importance to every young man and woman. Knowing all that he knew of the ultimate destiny of man, he declares that "one thing is needful." All else, in his opinion, sinks into comparative insignificance. This is very different from the common view. If the question were asked, What is the chief good in life? the answer most men would give, would be, to have sufficient money for our daily need, to have a fortune which places the possessor beyond the possibility of want. And truly, when we contrast the lot of the poor, with that of the rich, such an answer is not without reason. Setting aside the personal and selfish considerations, it is good that a man should be able to provide comforts for those he loves, to have a doctor for them when they are sick, to send them to a healthy climate, to give them a good education, and to leave them when he dies a sufficient sum to save them from poverty and hardship. Money is no slight or contemptible good. Then some desire power or fame, or a hundred other things which are held in high esteem. But Christ puts all these aside as being surpassed so completely by this "one thing," that they are not worth consideration: "but one thing is needful." What that one thing was there can be no doubt. His utterance in his first sermon sufficiently indicates it: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

This then is Christ's counsel to every young person beginning life. In effect, there are many things desirable, many things which men may legitimately seek, but this is the only thing absolutely essential. To attain this ought to be the supreme aim, and other things may, or may not be attained. Any, or all of them will be wisely sacrificed, if they stand in the way of the essential thing. That must be had at any cost, because that is needful. As he showed in his Parable of Dives and Lazarus, there is no wealth or luxury which can compensate for missing this one thing. Lazarus, who had it, though he was a diseased, repulsive pauper, was more enviable than Dives, with his health, and his purple and fine linen, and his sumptuous fare. Christ did not divide the world as we divide it, into the upper and lower classes, the rich and the poor. His division was between those who had the essential thing, and those who did not have it. The rich might be among those who had it; the poor might be among those who missed it; the mere question of rank, or station, or wealth was a small, unimportant thing compared with the one crucical distinction which separated men into two great companies.

Accepting this great doctrine of life, as we being Christians are bound to do, on the solemn dictum of the Master, how ought it to affect our lives? The contrast between the women which drew out the expression of Christ, shows his meaning. We may be sure that he appreciated the love Martha showed in her concern for his comfort. Being human, he could not be insensible to the pleasure of eating a well-cooked meal. But this was a small matter in comparison with his pleasure in having an eager, earnest, receptive listener. Martha was worried, anxious, harassed about a matter that was of small concern to him. A year or two before, tired, and weary, and hungry, he had seated himself on a well side, while his disciples went to buy food. When they returned, they found him so much refreshed that they were astonished, and he had to explain to them that he had had meat to eat that they knew not of. That meat was contact with an inquiring soul, ready to receive what he had to give. So it was with Mary. Her attentive soul hanging on his lips was a better restorative to him than the best supper Martha could produce. So he would have his followers be. The good things of life, are good in their way, but the spiritual are infinitely better. They are the first concern, and all else should be subordinate. With this conception of values, Martha's worry would be eliminated from our lives. The lower aims are not worth worrying about. There are duties to be done, work to be performed, and our consciences ought to make us careful that the work shall be well and faithfully done, but so clearly should we see that the higher things are alone essential, that the lower should never cause us fret or vexation. Disappointments, and losses, and failures may come, but if there is in the heart a true conception of what is really the chief good in life, they will not have power to perturb the spirit, or to disturb our equanimity. We shall not be unduly elated by worldly success, nor depressed by worldly failure, if we have learned to say with Christ, "But one thing is needful," for we know that having that, it shall not be taken away from us.

Good Books for India

Mr. Moody is anxious to send Christian literature to India. Last year he sent a thousand of the Colportage Library books, issued by the Bible Institute of Chicago, to Albert Norton, secretary of the Evangelistic Book Depot at Poona for distribution. These were disposed of, and Mr. Moody now wants funds with which to send Mr. Norton one hundred thousand more. Contributions may be sent to Dwight L. Moody at East Northfield, Mass.

A Notable Book on Africa

THE Flaming Torch is the latest and most notable of the many books written by William Taylor, D.D., LL.D., the venerable ex-Bishop of Africa. It deals with his life-work among the heathen people of that continent, and is in fact a history of its moral, spiritual and material development. Beginning with the earliest glimpses afforded of that dark land, the reverend writer reviews its history before the Christian era and since. The various invasions to which it has been subjected, the great wars that have ravaged and desolated its territory, the subjugation of its races, the periods of later exploration and discovery, and, greatest of all, the dawn of Gospel illumination, are all sketched with a fidelity to history and graphic detail which make the story remarkable.

The record of Christian work in Africa is probably more comprehensively given here than in any former work on the subject. Over 700 explorers have traveled through that mysterious land, of whom 550 have there found their last resting-place—their lives sacrificed to the love of science and the desire for the welfare of the human race.

The book discloses a great amount of valuable information, which only a lover of Africa could have collected and treasured up for such a purpose. The romance of exploration is told with that hearty love of adventure which gives a unique interest to the subject of African travel. Bishop Taylor's book abounds in hair-breadth escapes, perilous experiences in the great African forests, and adventures with wild beasts and equally wild tribes of men. Heathen Africa he pictures to the utmost detail: with its tribal superstitions, idol-worship, witchcraft, cruel rites, cannibalism, and all their dark and hideous train. The progress of the Gospel is traced with the skilful hand of an able writer, and the many triumphs it has achieved in Africa are pointed out for the encouragement and comfort of Christians everywhere.

In the closing chapter of the book, the partition of Africa by the European powers is interestingly sketched and a forecast of the future given. Much of the volume deals with the personal experiences of the writer. The whole book is by far the most notable of recent contributions on exploration and Gospelization. The Flaming Torch is a book of 675 pages, copiously illustrated. There is an introduction by Henry M. Stanley, the well-known explorer. The work is published by Eaton & Mains, New York City.

Hints for Teachers

The Story of the Thirteen Colonies, by H. A. Guerber. A volume of electic school readings, by an author whose educational works, especially those relating to American history, have enjoyed a very wide popularity. The present volume is an elementary text-book of national history, so simply worded as to be easily intelligible to average children of 10 to 12 years of age. In her preface, the author gives some hints for teachers. She says:

"Pupils consider historical matches more exciting than spelling matches. To vary recitations, matches can be conducted in various ways. For instance, all the question cards bearing upon the parts of the book already perused can be divided between the two 'sides.' The pupils furnish oral or written answers, the side answering most questions correctly reaping the honors. The match can also be carried on by the teacher's supplying names or dates, and requiring pupils on alternate sides to state clearly what they know in connection with them. At other times, ordinary quiz methods can be used, or the teacher can relate some fact or anecdote, calling upon different pupils to supply the purposely omitted names or dates.

"Children are also often deeply interested in verbal pictures. For example, the teacher, without mentioning name, time, or place, can describe Franklin flying his kite, Ethan Allen surprising the garrison at Ticonderoga, Columbus at La Rabida, etc. The description ended, each pupil can write down the names of the characters described, and mention time, place, and other fact the teacher calls for. Such historical riddles seem more like play than work to the average child, and before long all take great pride in making verbal pictures of their own, to be guessed by their schoolmates, or handed to the teacher instead of an ordinary composition. Such work not only appeals to childish imagination, but cultivates memory and attention while firmly fixing important facts in the mind."

The book is handsomely illustrated; pp. 342; cloth covers. American Book Co., New York and Chicago, publishers.

Mr. Kipling's Religion*

Mr. Kipling's religion is neither new nor complex. It shares with his heroes and his words a simple and primal nature. There was never, in fact, a religion with less scaffolding of formal theology. Such theology as there is to this faith is of the most uncompromising orthodoxy, but for the most part it is conspicuously absent and the faith itself springs up straight from the broad base of human feeling, unexplained and undefended. Mr. Kipling ob- [illegible] is not long enough to waste in proving that there is no one in particular at the head of affairs.

"For this reason, the Deputy is above the Assistant, the Commissioner above the Deputy, the Lieutenant-Governor above the Commissioner, and the Viceroy above all four, under the orders of the Secretary of State, who is responsible to the Empress. If the Empress be not responsible to her Maker—if there is no Maker for her to be responsible to—the entire system of Our Administration must be wrong, which is manifestly impossible." Far more serious is Mr. Kipling's tone in "McAndrews' Hymn," in which out of the mouth of the old Scotch engineer he suggests a belief in fore-ordination:

I see thy Hand, O God,
Pre-destination in the stride
[illegible]

And even more explicitly in his own words from the introduction to the new "Outward Bound" edition of his works, closing it as follows: Remembering this one thing sure in all uncertainties: as it is written.

[illegible]

These are but shreds, unwoven and far enough from any ordered texture whatever, and though many such might be picked out and gathered together, they would serve only to make the simpleness of the religion of their maker more plain. And its antiquity: for as little in religion as in state-craft or verse-forms is Mr. Kipling an innovator. His is a healthy, austere, old fashioned faith—the faith of England and the Old Testament. The two great utterances that we have had of it, "The Recessional," and "The Hymn Before Action," are compound of the words of the Psalmist and Milton and Cromwell.

*From The Answer of Mr. Kipling, an Essay by W. B. Parker, in which the author's religious views are discussed as evinced in his prose and verse productions. A neat little booklet, of 22 pages. Price, 50 cents. Mansfield & Wessels, New York, publishers.

MAP SHOWING THE DISTRICT DEVASTATED BY THE GREAT TEXAS FLOOD

The Brazos Valley, Texas, has been visited by the greatest flood ever known in that section. Swollen by heavy rains, the Brazos, Little Brazos, Lower Colorado, and Guadaloupe rivers overflowed their banks and inundated a section of Southern Texas almost as large as New England, and embracing some of the finest cotton land in the State. Nearly 40 inches of rain fell in a single week. The Brazos was a raging sea, fully five miles wide and carried down with it dwellings, furniture, fences and live stock from hundreds of farms. It is estimated that 500,000 bales of cotton were lost, and that the total damage to crops will reach $5,000,000, and to live stock and other property, probably $7,000,000. The most serious feature of the flood, however, is the loss of human life. At the first approach of the rising waters, the dwellers on the low lands along the river sought places of refuge. So quickly did the flood advance that the flight became a panic. Hundreds ran to the nearest hillocks or rising ground; many sought safety in the tree-tops and others took to boats or rude rafts. Many were drowned in their houses. Near Brookshire, some 300, mostly negroes, sought refuge on a little island, where many perished before the rescuing boats arrived. From Brenham to Quintana throughout a long list of river towns and villages, these exciting scenes were repeated. At Wallis, Richmond, San Felipe, Rosenberg, Fulshear, Sartartia, Sunnyside, Elm Creek, Velasco, Columbia, Thompson and many other places, loss of life and property occurred. Railroad bridges were swept away, roadbeds washed out, and telegraph lines greatly damaged. At Hearne thirty-five lives are said to have been lost and forty at Calvert. Seven counties suffered, and their condition at latest reports was such as to call for the promptest relief, which the large cities of the State—Galveston, Houston, Dallas, etc.—were generously furnishing. Rescue parties, with boats and steamers laden with food, are now on the scene. There are apprehensions that fever may follow the recession of the floods. Governor Sayers of Texas has ordered 20,000 rations to be issued by the State for the relief of the destitute, and medical aid will also be afforded.

All of a Tremble

By Pastor Thomas Spurgeon

AN amusing story is told of a certain man-o'-war's man who though able-bodied was none too willing hearted. "Well, my man, and what's the matter with you?" said the fleet-surgeon, to whom he had applied for advice. "Dunno, Sir, I'm sure," said Jack, "I eats well, and I sleeps well, but soon as ever I sees a job o' work, I'm all of a tremble." History does not record the surgeon's prescription. Perhaps he had not in all his pharmacopœia an unfailing specific for laziness. Some other naval authority would need to deal with this case, using possibly a remedy "for outward application only."

But what is to be done with those who prove listless in the service of Christ and the church? They eat well, and they sleep well. They are never weary of "feeding on the truth," or of "resting in the promises," but when some arduous service is to be rendered, or when some generous giving is needed they decline with thanks. The sight of "a job o' work" makes them "all of a tremble." As it was in the days of Noah, so it is even now. "The oxen were ploughing and the asses were feeding beside them." Thank God for the toilers in the field; how patient and plodding they are. They stand like the ox between the plough and the altar—ready for either! As for the rest they are as the —— no, I must not make comparisons. Suffice it to say that they are "feeding beside them." They never miss a meal. They are hearers if not doers of the word. Their capacity for sermons is prodigious, but they never take any exercise. What wonder is it that they suffer from spiritual dyspepsia. Ask them to take a class in the Sunday School, to direct a seeker, or to join the Tract Society, and they declare their inability for any such service. Oh dear no, they are so nervous, and they "never have done anything of the kind," and they don't feel called to it." The "job o' work" has made them "all of a tremble." Poor creatures! Unless they are stirred out of that lethargic state they will go from bad to worse. It is well that the Lord himself often takes such in hand. Something very like "the rope's end" wakes them from their selfish reverie, sends them about their Father's business and cures them of this unholy trembling.

Yet it must be confessed that there is a kind of trembling in view of solemn tasks and sacred things that is altogether commendable. Moses trembled at God's word while the bush was burning and when the mount was smoking. To that man God will look who trembleth at his word. Eli's heart trembled for the ark of God when he saw the man of Benjamin running out of the army with earth upon his head, and we may well be fearful when the children of Israel turn their backs in the day of battle, and truth is sacrificed to the latest discovery.

At thought of the responsibilities that devolve on the workers, they may be excused for a measure of trepidation. A little of the spirit of trembling is a good thing. It is infinitely to be preferred to the self-confidence of some. Better many flutterings of heart than any effrontery. Anything is better than the cocksureness (pardon the word, it is so expressive) which is born of pride. Some have supposed that they are not fit for duties they have accepted because they suffer as they enter upon them. This is quite a mistake. Provided the trembling is not due to distrust of God, it may be the best possible preparation for preaching, or teaching, or writing. The spirit is willing but the flesh is weak. The ordeal of facing a mass of people, to say nothing of the anxiety for their eternal welfare, may well affect us. We are scarcely fit to minister to them if such considerations do not try us. Even fear-tried soldiers confess to some apprehension before the fight begins, and the greatest of preachers have been overcome by solicitude and diffidence on entering their pulpits. My late father, C. H. Spurgeon, was more or less agitated before preaching to the end of his most useful life. It is recorded in his autobiography that, preaching in Belfast in 1858, he said: "God is my witness that I never yet feared the face of man, be he who or what he may; but I often tremble—yea, I always do—in ascending the pulpit, lest I do not faithfully proclaim the Gospel to poor, perishing sinners. The anxiety of rightly preparing and delivering a discourse, so that the preacher may fully preach Christ to his hearers and pray them, in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God, is such as only he knows who loves the souls of men. It is no child's play to be the occupant of a pulpit: he who finds it to be so may find it to be something more fearful than devil's play when the day of judgment shall come." These are solemn words—the more so as they fell from the lips of one who was specially gifted. Oh, for an increase of this spirit! We approach our sacred tasks too light-heartedly. We become accustomed to the work. We outgrow our nervousness and forget our helplessness. And what are the consequences? Our hearers do not quail before the heart-searching truth, nor hearken to the solemn warnings, nor respond to the loving invitations. If these things do not impress the speakers, they are not likely to influence their listeners. Perfunctory and professional preaching is sure to induce careless hearing. How can it be otherwise? If we tremble the people will. They are quick to tell whether or no we really seek their highest interest If the burden of the Lord is on the speaker, he is pretty sure to have an eager and attentive audience.

Mere timidity is not what I am advocating. That is no more to be desired than temerity. Some are so weak and fearful that it may well be questioned if they are fit for such public service as they venture upon. Their hearers are so pained that they cannot well be profited Yet even these, did they wait upon the Lord more trustfully, might triumph gloriously, for he can transform our disabilities into coigns of vantage. What I desire for my fellow-laborers and myself is that we may be so conscious of our tremendous task and of our own incompetence that we shall be driven to prayer and have our hearts filled, not with carking care, but with Christlike concern. This may affect our nerves; this may seem to unman us, but there is no better preparation. There will still be room for hope, and faith, and joy.

Yet must we mingle with this holy anxiety an unwavering confidence in God. The work is his and so are we, the workers. Then wherefore should we fear? We must distinguish between solicitude and cowardice. The best way to be fearless is to be filled with the fear of the Lord. The trembling we desire is the companion of trust and the harbinger of triumph. The harp-strings tremble when they resound with their gladder chords!

Prevailing Prayer

M. P. Davis, Wooster, O., a reader of this journal, has furnished the following exceedingly interesting incident of the Civil War. She writes:

"From a letter, written by a mother to her son in the army, the incident is taken. I should be glad to know which battle and regiment it was.

"Just before one of the severest battles of the war, and when the men of a certain regiment had been told they would be required to make a desperate charge in the evening, some of the pious men of the regiment—fifty-seven in all—requested that they have a few minutes to themselves, to have prayer together. The leader of the meeting read to the men the 91st Psalm, and exhorted them to believe with all their hearts, and take to themselves the promises, believing that God would keep every one safe who put his trust in Him. That destruction might waste at noon day and ten thousand might fall at their right hand, but it should not come nigh them. Then the fifty-seven knelt down together, and told the Lord they would take him at his word!

"Not an hour had passed, before they were ordered as a regiment into line, and the charge upon the enemy's works was sounded. It was a terrific struggle. The regiment went into the fight 800 strong. They came out less than 200. But of the fifty-seven, not one was hurt, and all returned to give praise to God, for their preservation."

"'Now,' said one of the fifty-seven, when relating the facts 'you must not say that this was accidental; we believe that it was providential. Nothing will make us believe that the hand of God was not in it.'"

"To err is human." Don't continue the mistake of neglecting your blood. For any disorder in the stomach, kidneys, liver or bowels, take Hood's Sarsaparilla. It will put you in good health.

Ministry

THE memory of a kindly word
Long, long gone by,
The fragrance of a fading flower
Sent lovingly,
The gleaming of a sudden smile
Or sudden tear,
The warmer pressure of the hand,
The tone of cheer,
The hush that means, "I cannot speak
But I have heard!"
The note that only bears a verse
From God's own Word;
Such tiny things we hardly count
As ministry,
The givers deeming they have shown
Scant sympathy;
But when the heart is overwrought—
Oh, who can tell
The power of such tiny things
To make it well?

Result: Above are samples of "Soft Soap" or "Soap Paste" made with PEARLINE, and with two of the leading powders which are claimed to be "Same as" or "Good as" PEARLINE.

The bottle to the right contains a solid mass of pure, white "Soap Paste" or "Soft Soap," made with PEARLINE—thick enough to stand alone.

The bottle in the middle is one of "Same as" and contents is one-quarter poor, thin, mushy soap—balance (three-quarters) discolored water.

The bottle to the left is a poorer "Same as," and contains simply discolored water, with a sediment (not soapy) at bottom. The middle and left-hand bottles are fair samples of the many powders offered in place of PEARLINE. Try the experiment yourself—directions on back of each package.

Some powders are worthless, some inefficient, others dangerous. Pearline is the standard. The Millions of Packages of PEARLINE used each year proves

Pearline Best by Test

Note. The difference in price between Pearline and the most worthless Soap Powders is nominal. A year's supply would not equal the value of one ordinary garment ruined.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Jere. B., Lansing, Mich. What is the nationality of the Duke of Abruzzi, the Polar explorer?

Spanish. He [illegible] and is a son of the late Prince Amadeo by his first marriage. His mother, Maria del Pozzo della Cisterna, died while he was a mere child.

Jacob H., Johnstown, Pa. Is David's mother's name given in the Bible?

Some scholars have contended that Nahash (see II. Sam., 17:25, and I. Chron., 2:16) was the mother of David, but as Abigail and Zeruiah are mentioned, not as Jesse's daughters, but as David's sisters, it is held by others as probable that they were the daughters of Jesse's wife by a former husband named Nahash.

Captain and Post Chaplain J. H. Macomber writes from Camp Presidio, San Francisco, Calif., thanking THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in behalf of the soldiers at that post for the copies of this journal and especially for the copies of St. John's Gospel in English and Spanish.

A. B. C., Eastbrook, Me. Is not a minister inconsistent who preaches from Matt., 6:34: Take therefore no thought for the morrow, etc., and then takes up a collection in this hot weather to equip the church with heating apparatus for the winter?

No, there is no inconsistency. He would be inconsistent if he went around wringing his hands and worrying himself about what would be done in the winter without proper heating apparatus. Christ did not prohibit foresight and provision for future emergencies. His prohibition was against foreboding and harass and distress of mind. Our translation does not make this so clear as it is in the original lan-

Despairing One.—Ind. I have sought the Lord for years, but have never been able to exercise faith in Christ as my Saviour. I have confessed my sins and asked forgiveness, but I have never had the assurance that others feel. Do you think God has cast me off?

By no means; but he will, if you refuse the way of salvation he has provided. He makes the definite promise that whosoever believes on [that is, trusts implicitly] Jesus Christ for salvation, shall never perish (see John, 3:16). What more do you need? You must take him at his word. You may be quite sure he will fulfill it. Never mind about assurance or the experience of others. Lay fast hold of the promise, break completely with all sin and go about your duty with a quiet mind.

Reader. Where is the so-called "Apostles' Clock" [illegible]

You no doubt mean the famous Strasburg clock, designed by Isaac Habrecht, a Jewish astrologer, in 1439. It is one of the few really wonderful clocks in existence. It is of dark wood, gilded and carved, and is sixty feet high and church-shaped. According to an old description, it "gives the time of all the principal cities in the world, the day of the week and month, course of sun and planets, and all the eclipses of both sun and moon. Above the dial, in an alcove, is an image of Christ, and every day at noon, figures representing the twelve apostles, march around the image and bow." Hence, doubtless, the name of the "Apostles' Clock."

Inquirer, Memphis, Tenn. How much vacant government land, available for agricultural purposes, has the United States at the present [illegible]

According to an official report just issued, there are 553,995,000 acres of vacant government land, exclusive of Alaska and our new colonies, and also exclusive of Indian reservations, forest reserves, national parks, military reservations and the like. All these, added, would bring up the grand total to 1,000,000,000 acres.

W. P. M., Troy, N. Y. Bunyan wrote his Pilgrims Progress in Bedford jail, and Mme. Guyon, [illegible] poems. Can you inform me, through THE MAIL-BAG, of any other instances of notable literary labor under duress?

There are many. Bœthius composed his [illegible] by the churches. There are references, less [illegible] longer prayer had been uttered which John did not report. Another instance is Luke 11:1. The prayer is not given, but the disciples [illegible] sages in the Acts showing that there was public prayer in the assemblies. In one case [illegible] Paul's prayer being audible. Perhaps the minister you refer to was misunderstood. He would not be likely to contend that Christ was opposed to all public prayer. 2. There is no solid ground for such an assertion. Eusebius, who was born in 270 A. D., mentions the [illegible] by the churches. There are references, less [illegible] Besides that, there are certain wants common [illegible] the leader may appropriately voice for all. Besides the great prayer of John 17, there are some instances in which Christ prayed [illegible] poems. There are many. Bœthius composed his [illegible] wrote his Commentary in prison; Cervantes, it is said, was a galley-slave in Barbary, during part of the time in which he was engaged in writing Don Quixote; Sir Walter Raleigh, while in London Tower, wrote much of his History of the World.

P. H. B., Grand Haven, Mich. 1. A minister recently said in conversation with a reporter that public prayer in the pulpit or elsewhere was vulgar and plebeian: that Christ never prayed in public, but directed men to pray in their closets. Do you agree with him? 2. Is the contention of the same minister true that the Gospel of John was not written until four hundred years after Christ's death?

1. It is quite true that Christ told men to direct, by earlier writers which lead to the belief that they had the Gospel of John before them when they wrote. The best Biblical scholars, even the most radical, are now of opinion that it was written by the Apostle John before the end of the first century.

Miss Anna P., Bird City, Kan., writes of the Canada thistle, stating that instead of being a useful plant for fodder, as the Agricultural Department lately intimated, it is a great annoyance to farmers and a heavy detriment to crops. She says: "Horses will not eat it when cut or cured, and cattle, only when it is young and before it goes to seed. It sometimes measures three feet across (a single plant)."

THE TOWN OF MONTE, GRAND CANARY ISLAND, W. A.

Grand Canary Island is off the coast of West Africa. All West African ships call at the Port of Las Palmas. It is a lovely, pure and healthy climate. The interior of this island is mountainous, and has one large volcanic crater which has been inactive for many centuries. The population is chiefly agricultural, and the people live in little Spanish houses on the hill-sides. There is much cultivation of the vine, fig, olive and palm, and many acres of vines cover the hills. The fine, tonic climate is a boon to missionaries, who, when enfeebled by long-continued labors in the African field, go there for a season of rest and recuperation. If there were at any convenient point in Grand Canary Island a place devoted wholly to the use of missionaries, to which the faithful workers of any Christian denomination might come to gain strength after attacks of fever and other tropical sickness, it is confidently believed that many valuable lives would be saved. Already steps have been taken with a view to establishing a missionary retreat at Monte, which has an elevation of 1,000 feet above the sea. Mr. T. M. MacKnight, of Las Palmas, Grand Canary Island, has charge of the project.

The Gospel in the Northern Woods

A WINTER CAMP OF THE MANITOBA LOGGERS

THERE is not, in all Canada, a more picturesque or healthful region than the Riding Mountains of Manitoba. These so-called mountains are really only elevated tracts of land densely covered by trees, the woods being interspersed with lakes and rivers. These forests are about one hundred miles long and thirty miles in width. Many woodmen and lumbermen are employed upon these hills during the winter months. They live in log camps, sometimes as many as seventy-five together. The trees which they cut down are used for saw-logs or to make railroad ties. They are drawn to a "dump" on the banks of the nearest river, whence they are floated down in a "drive" as soon as the snow melts. Until last winter, the spiritual needs of these lumbermen were overlooked by the Christian churches, and neither minister nor missionary was provided for them. The men themselves come from all parts of the world; many of them from excellent Christian homes, where fathers and mothers pray for their absent boys. Some come straight from the "thrashing gangs" of the harvest fields to the lumber camps. The greater number are thus for six or seven months of the year entirely destitute of religious privileges; but, though they have neither teacher nor Bible, they are usually plentifully supplied with "Satan's picture-books," (cards) as well as with sensational literature. As might be expected, the results are disastrous to religion and morality.

Early last winter a request was sent to the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, New York, asking that special petition be offered up for the lumbermen on the Riding Mountains of Manitoba. This led to something being done which promises to have far-reaching results. Soon the work was taken up by Methodist and Presbyterian churches. The Presbytery of Minnesota sent a missionary who labored about two months in the camp of the Assiniboine Lumber Company, where he found much encouragement, and preached to the men in camp Sundays, provided them with good reading matter, and cared for their sick. Pneumonia was quite prevalent in one of the camps, on account of the buildings being constructed of green logs, and the sick men had to be driven in sleighs about thirty five miles to the nearest town—Strathclair—where they were kindly nursed and had good medical attendance, all save one ultimately recovering. The missionary found that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was the paper most in demand; indeed, they never had enough copies to satisfy those who wanted to read. While he was with the men, constant prayer was made by the interested churches and those at home for the salvation of all the laborers on the mountains. Gospel tracts and good religious reading matter were sent to the various camps along the mountain range which the missionary could not personally visit. Such was the influence of those prayers offered up by God's people at home, as well as of the work of the faithful laborer in the field, that under Divine blessing, 202 persons gave in their names at one of the camps as having been led to know Christ; at the same time, in answer to prayer, the Holy Spirit was working upon the hearts of many of the men in the other camps. One young man who came from another part of the mountain, on being asked about his soul's welfare, said "the matter was settled: Jesus had saved him at Pedam Creek, on the Riding Mountains, where a godly preacher had spoken the Gospel message each alternate Sunday during the winter."

At all the lumber camps, the missionary found the overseers and officers courteous and friendly. One of the officers led the singing very heartily at the Sunday services. On one occasion, a party of mission workers drove out in a sleigh from the nearest town, thirty-five miles distant from the camps. They took an organ with them and stayed over Sunday. When the men heard the unwonted music at the service, they were delighted beyond measure, and the visitors played and sang hymn after hymn to them for hours. Such a scene had never before been witnessed in the Riding Mountains.

It has been roughly estimated that there are about one hundred thousand men in the "thrashing gangs" and lumber camps of the United States and Canada, whose souls need to be cared for, as well as those of the men in Manitoba. The experience related above shows what can be accomplished through the power of consecrated, believing prayer, and the efforts of Christian people. Meanwhile, any reader who is interested in the welfare of the men who will be busy next fall and winter in the lumber camps of the Riding Mountains, can get in touch with the work by addressing Mr. David M. Ross, missionary, Strathclair Station, Marquette County, Can. Our illustrations are from photographs taken specially by Mr. Walter Barrie, on the timber limits of the Assiniboine Lumber Company, and they present various phases of the work as it goes on each winter.

MISSIONARY PARTY VISITING A LUMBER CAMP IN WINTER

China in Prophecy

A correspondent of an English journal points out that China is a Bible Land (see Isa. 49: 12). The Lord Jesus is represented in this chapter as the One Divine Servant of Jehovah, whose service is as the living root whence is to grow a great tree, whose boughs, fruit-laden with "grace and truth," are to extend even to the land of Sinim; or as a fountain whence are to flow rivers of living water to the kingdom of the Tchins. The Arabians and other Asiatics call China "Sin," or "Tchin," from a dynasty of that name. Dr. Parker, a missionary to China, says that the Chinese have been known from time immemorial by the name of Tschin. The whole chapter in which this marvelous land is mentioned constitutes a proclamation by the Messiah himself, and is a prediction of his kingdom. He announces his destiny and determination with reference to the Gentiles. In that glorious ministry of Gentile ingathering, "other sheep I have which are not of this fold, them also I must bring" (John 10). China has its place as a nation to eventually become Christian.

Safeguards for Youth

The Work of the Society for the Suppression of Vice in Behalf of Moral Purity

IN a letter addressed to this journal, Mr. Anthony Comstock, Secretary of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, gives a most interesting review of the work of that organization. He writes:

I have devoted more than twenty-seven years of my life to the defence of the moral purity of the children of this nation. During that time the Society has made more than 2,300 arrests and has seized more than 75 tons of contraband matters. About two weeks ago we seized in the City of New York 1,550 photographs, and 1,535 negatives for making photographs, which for absolute vileness of character, beggars description. Many institutions of learning have been invaded by moral contagion more to be dreaded than Asiatic cholera or yellow fever. Evidences of the demoralizing of the youth of this nation are constantly and painfully intruded upon us. One man whom I arrested in Pennsylvania, had, previous to his arrest, sent fourteen varieties of books into an institution of learning in this State, where there were 145 boys. From this man and his printer, I one afternoon took in the city of Lancaster, Pa., nearly 16,000 books and several thousand pictures and circulars besides. His printer received a sentence of three years' imprisonment, while this young rascal got off with seven months. After serving his time in the Moyemensing county jail, he went to Chicago. Shortly after his arrival there I received complaints where the worst literature was being sent to students in eight colleges. We hunted the party down, and he is now in the Reformatory at Pontiac.

We require about $10,000 a year to carry on the work. We have a good equipment, a splendid Board of Managers, composed of men who are moral heroes and who have ever stood unflinchingly in defence of the children of this nation. Will you not, through your paper, present this cause of moral purity and the defence of the integrity of the 33,000,000 of boys and girls in this country, and ask Christian men and women to give us such pecuniary support and assistance as will relieve us from the burden of debt; give us a permanent fund to work with, and thus enable us to carry forward this warfare, with the same fervent zeal and consecrated effort that has characterized our work during the past twenty-seven years? Since the 1st of January this year, we have made thirty-nine arrests, and there are more to follow soon. We have seized more than two tons of contraband matter this year. About fifty cases have been disposed of in the courts, one acquitted, the others convicted

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

... Buyers and Sellers ...

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Prov. 20: 14, . . . It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth.

PALACES are not such prisons as the world imagines. If you think that the only time kings and queens come forth from royal gates is in procession and gorgeously attended, you are mistaken. Incognito, by day or by night, and clothed in citizen's apparel, or the dress of a working woman, they come out and see the world as it is. In no other way could King Solomon, the author of my text, have known everything that was going on. From my text, I am sure he must, in disguise, some day have walked into a store of ready-made clothing, in Jerusalem, and stood near the counter, and heard a conversation between a buyer and a seller. The merchant put a price on a coat, and the customer began to dicker and said: "Absurd! that coat is not worth what you ask for it. Why, just look at the coarseness of the fabric! See that spot on the collar! Besides that, it does not fit. Twenty dollars for that? Why, it is not worth more than ten. They have a better article than that, and for lower price, down at Clothem, Fitem & Brothers. Besides that, I don't want it at any price. Good morning." "Hold," says the merchant: "do not go off in that way. I want to sell you that coat. I have some payments to make and I want the money. Come, now, how much will you give for that coat?" "Well," says the customer, "I will split the difference. You asked twenty dollars, and I said ten. Now, I will give you fifteen." "Well," says the merchant, "it is a great sacrifice, but take it at that price." Then the customer with a roll under his arm started to go out and enter his own place of business, and Solomon in disguise followed him. He heard the customer as he unrolled the coat say: "Boys, I have made a great bargain. How much do you guess I gave for that coat?" "Well," says one, wishing to compliment his enterprise, "you gave thirty dollars for it." Another says, "I should think you got it cheap if you gave twenty-five dollars." "No," says the buyer in triumph, "I got it for fifteen dollars. I beat him down and pointed out the imperfections, until I really made him believe it was not worth hardly anything. It takes me to make a bargain. Ha! Ha!" O, man, you got the goods for less than they were worth by positive falsehood; and no wonder, when Solomon went back to his palace and had put off his disguise, that he sat down at his writing-desk and made for all ages a crayon sketch of you: "It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer, but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth."

There are no higher styles of men in all the world than those now at the head of mercantile enterprises in the cities of this continent." Never since the world stood have there been so many merchants whose transactions can stand the test of the ten commandments. Such bargain-makers are all the more to be honored, because they have withstood, year after year, temptations which have flung so many flat, and flung them so hard, they can never, never recover themselves. While all positions in life have powerful besetments to evil, there are specific forms of allurement which are peculiar to each occupation and profession, and it will be useful to speak of the peculiar temptations of business men.

First, as in the scene of the text, business men are often tempted to sacrifice plain truth, the seller by exaggerating the value of goods, and the buyer by depreciating them. We cannot but admire an expert salesman. See how he first induces the customer into a mood favorable to the proper consideration of the value of the goods. He shows himself to be an honest and frank salesman. How carefully the lights are arranged till they fall just right upon the fabric! Beginning with goods of medium quality, he gradually advances toward those of more thorough make, and of more attractive pattern. How he watches the moods and whims of his customer! With what perfect calmness he takes the order, and bows the purchaser from his presence, who goes away having made up his mind that he has bought the goods at a price which will allow him a living margin when he again sells them. The goods were worth what the salesman said they were, and were sold at a price which will not make it necessary for the house to fail every ten years in order to fix up things.

But with what burning indignation we think of the inquitous stratagems by which goods are sometimes disposed of. A glance at the morning papers shows the arrival at one of our hotels of a young merchant from one of the inland cities. He is a comparative stranger in the great city, and, of course, he must be shown around, and it will be the duty of some of our enterprising houses to escort him. He is a large purchaser and has plenty of time and money, and it will pay to be very attentive. The evening is spent at a place of doubtful amusement. Then they go back to the hotel. Having just come to town, they must, of course, drink. A friend from the same mercantile establishment drops in, and usage and generosity suggest that they must drink. Business prospects are talked over, and the stranger is warned against certain dilapidated mercantile establishments that are about to fail, and for such kindness and magnanimity of caution against the dishonesty of other business houses, of course it is expected they will—and so they do—take a drink. Other merchants lodging in adjoining rooms find it hard to sleep for the clatter of decanters, and the coarse carousal of these "hail fellows well met" waxes louder. But they sit not all night at the wine cup. They must see the sights. They stagger forth with cheeks flushed and eyes bloodshot. The outer gates of hell open to let in the victims. The wings of lost souls flit among the lights, and the steps of the carousers sound with the rumbling thunders of the lost. Farewell to all the sanctities of home! Could mother, sister, father, slumbering in the inland home, in some vision of that night catch a glimpse of the ruin wrought they would rend out their hair by the roots and bite the tongue till the blood spurted, shrieking out: "God save him!"

What, suppose you, will come upon such business establishments? and there are hundreds of them in the cities. They may boast of fabulous sales, and they may have an unprecedented run of buyers, and the name of the house may be a terror to all rivals, and from this thrifty root there may spring up branch houses in other cities, and all the partners of the firm may move into their mansions and drive their full-blooded span, and the families may sweep the street with the most elegant apparel that human art ever wove, or earthly magnificence ever achieved. But a curse is gathering surely for those men, and the judgment will come and they will stand aghast before it, and all the business iniquities of a lifetime will gather around them, saying, "Do you remember this?" and, "Do you remember that?" And clerks that they compelled to dishonesty, and runners and [illegible] who saw behind the scenes, will bear testimony to their nefarious deeds, and some virtuous soul that once stood aghast at the splendor and power of these business men will say, "Alas! this is all that is left of that great firm that occupied a block with their merchandise and overshadowed the city with their influence, and made righteousness and truth and purity fall under the galling fire of avarice and crime."

While we admire and approve of all acuteness and tact in the sale of goods, we must condemn any process by which a fabric or product is represented as possessing a value which it really does not have. Nothing but sheer falsehood can represent as perfection boots that rip, silks that speedily lose their lustre, calicoes that immediately wash out, stoves that crack under the first hot fire, books insecurely bound, carpets that unravel, old furniture rejuvenated with putty and glue, and sold as having been recently manufactured, gold watches made out of brass, barrels of fruit, the biggest apples on the top, wine adulterated with strychnine, hosiery poorly woven, cloths of domestic manufacture with foreign labels.

Again, business men are often tempted to make the habits and customs of other traders their law of rectitude. There are commercial usages which will not stand the test of the last day. Yet men in business are apt to do as their neighbors do. If the majority of the traders in any locality are lax in principle, the commercial code in that community will be spurious and dishonest. It is a hard thing to stand close by the law of right when your next-door neighbor by his looseness of dealing is enabled to sell goods at a cheaper rate and decoy your customers. There are a hundred practices prevalent in the world of traffic which ought never to become the rule for honest men. Their wrong does not make your right. Sin never becomes virtue by being multiplied and admitted at brokers' board or merchants' exchange. Because others smuggle a few things in passenger trunks, because others take usury when men are in tight places, because others deal in fancy stocks, because others palm off worthless endorsements, because others do nothing but blow bubbles, do not, therefore, be overcome of temptation. Hollow pretension and fictitious credit, and commercial gambling may awhile prosper, but the day of reckoning cometh, and in addition to the horror and condemnation of outraged communities, the curse of God will come, blow after blow. God's law forever and forever is the only standard of right and wrong, and not commercial ethics.

Young business man, avoid the first business dishonor and you will avoid all the rest. The captain of a vessel was walking near the mouth of a river when the tide was low, and there was a long stout anchor chain, into one of the great links of which his foot slipped, and it began to swell and he could not withdraw it. The tide began to rise. The chain could not be loosened nor filed off in time, and a surgeon was called to amputate the limb, but before the work could be done the tide rolled over the victim, and his life was gone. I have to tell you, young man, that just one wrong into which you slip may be a link of a long chain of circumstances from which you cannot be extricated by any ingenuity of your own, or any help from others, and the tides will roll over you as they have over many.

Again, business men are sometimes tempted to throw off personal responsibility, shifting it to the institution to which they belong. Directors in banks and railroad and insurance companies sometimes shirk personal responsibility underneath the action of the corporation. And how often, when some banking house or financial institution explodes through fraud, respectable men in the Board of Directors say, "Why, I thought all was going on in an honest way, and I am utterly confounded with this demeanor!" The banks, and the fire and life and marine insurance companies, and the railroad companies, will not stand up for judgment in the last day, but those who in them acted righteously will receive, each for himself, a reward, and those who acted the part of neglect or trickery will, each for himself, receive a condemnation. Unlawful dividends are not clean before God because there are those associated with you who grab just as big a pile as you do. He who countenances the dishonesty of the firm, or of the corporation, or association, takes upon himself all the moral [illegible] as many souls as it has members.

Again, many business men have been tempted to postpone their enjoyments and duties to a future season of entire leisure. What a sedative the Christian religion would be to all our business men if, instead of postponing its uses to old age or death, they would take it into the store or factory or worldly engagements now! It is folly to go amid the uncertainties of business life with no God to help. Many, although now comparatively straitened in worldly circumstances, have a goodly establishment in the future planned out. They have in imagination built, about twenty years ahead, a house in the country not difficult of access from the great town, for they will often have business or old accounts to settle, or investments to look after. The house is large enough to accommodate all their friends. The halls are wide, and hung with pictures of hunting-scenes and a branch of antlers, and are comfortable with chairs that can be rolled out on the veranda when the weather is inviting, or set out under some of the oaks that stand sentinel about the house, rustling in the cool breeze, and songful with the robins. There is just land enough to keep them interested, and its crops of almost fabulous richness springing up under application of the best theories to be found in the agricultural journals. The farm is well stocked with cattle and horses, and sheep that know the voice and have a kindly bleat when one goes forth to look at them. In this blissful abode their children will be instructed in art and science and religion. This shall be the old homestead to which the boys at college will direct their letters, and the hill on which the house stands will be called Oakwood or Ivy Hill or Pleasant Retreat or Eagle Eyrie. May the future have for every business man here all that and more beside! But are you postponing your happiness to that time? Are you adjourning your joys? Suppose that you achieve all you expect—and that the vision I mention is not up to the reality, because the fountains will be brighter, the house grander, and the scenery more picturesque—the mistake is none the less fatal. What charm will there be in rural quiet for a man who has for thirty or forty years been conforming his entire nature to the excitements of business? Will flocks and herds with their bleat and moan be able to silence the insatiable spirit of acquisitiveness which has for years had full swing in the soul! Will the hum of the breeze soothe the man who now can find his only enjoyment in the stock market? Will leaf and cloud and fountain charm the eye that has for three-fourths of a lifetime found its chief beauty in hogsheads and bills of sale? Will parents be competent to rear their children for high and holy purpose, if their infancy and boyhood and girlhood were neglected, when they are almost ready to enter upon the world and have all their habits fixed and their principles stereotyped? No, no; now is the time to be happy. Now is the time to serve your Creator. Now is the time to be a Christian. Are you too busy? I have known men as busy as you are who had a place in the store-loft where they went to pray. Some one asked a Christian sailor where he found any place to pray in. He said, "I can always find a quiet place at mast-head." And in the the busiest day of the season if your heart is right you can find a place to pray. Busy thoroughfares are good places to pray in as you go to meet your various engagements. Go home a little earlier and get introduced to your children. Be not a galley-slave by day and night, lashed fast to the oar of business. Let every day have its hour for worship and intellectual culture and recreation. Show yourself greater than your business. Act not as though after death you would enter upon an eternity of railroad stocks and coffees and ribbons. Roast not your manhood before the perpetual fires of anxiety. With every yard of cloth you sell, throw not in your soul to boot. Use firkin and counting-room desk and hardware crate as the step to glorious usefulness and highest Christian character. Decide once and forever who shall be master in your store, you or your business.

Again, business men are often tempted to let their calling interfere with the interests of the soul. God sends men into the business world to get educated, just as boys are sent to school and college. Purchase and sale, loss and gain, disappointment, prosperity, the dishonesty of others, panic, and bank suspension, are but different lessons in the school. The more business, the more means of grace. Many have gone through wildest panic unhurt. "Are you not afraid you will break?" said some one to a merchant in time of great commercial excitement. He replied, "Aye, I shall break when the fiftieth Psalm breaks, in the fifteenth verse, 'call upon me in the day of trouble and I will deliver thee.'" The store and the counting-house have developed some of the most stalwart characters. Perhaps originally they had but little sprightliness and force, but two or three hard business thumps woke them up from their lethargy, and there came a thorough development in their hearts of all that was good and holy and energetic and tremendous, and they have become the front men in Christ's army, as well as lighthouses in the great world of traffic. But business has been perpetual depletion to many a man. It first pulled out of him all benevolence, next all amiability, next all religious aspirations, next all conscience, and though he entered his vocation with large heart and noble character, he goes out of it a skeleton, enough to scare a ghost.

Men appreciate the importance of having a good business stand, a store on the right side of the street, or in the right block. Yet every place of business is a good stand for spiritual culture. God's angels hover over the world of traffic to sustain and build up those who are trying to do their duty. To-morrow it in your place of worldly engagement you will listen for it, you may hear a sound louder than the rattle of drays and the shuffle of feet and the chink of dollars stealing into your soul, saying, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all other things shall be added unto you." Yet some of those sharpest at a bargain are cheated out of their immortal blessedness by stratagems more palpable than any "drop-game" of the street. They make investments in things everlastingly below par. They put their valuables in a safe not fire-proof. They give full credit to influences that will not be able to pay one cent on the dollar. They plunge into a labyrinth from which no bankrupt law or "two thirds enactment" will ever extricate them. They take into their partnership the world, the flesh, and the devil, and the enemy of all righteousness will boast through eternal ages that the man who in all his business life could not be outwittted, at last tumbled into spiritual defalcation, and was swindled out of heaven.

Perhaps some of you saw the fire in New York in 1835. Aged men tell us that it beggared all description. Some stood on the housetops of Brooklyn and looked at the red ruin that swept down the streets, and threatened to obliterate the metropolis. But the commercial world will yet be startled by a greater conflagration, even the last one. Bills of exchange, policies of insurance, mortgages and bonds and Government securities, will be consumed in one lick of the flame. The Bourse and the United States Mint will turn to ashes. Gold will run molten into the dust of the street. Exchanges and granite blocks of merchandise will fall with a crash that will make the earth tremble. The flashing up of the great light will show the righteous the way to their thrones. Their best treasures in heaven, they will go up and take possession of them. The toils of business life, which racked their brains and rasped their nerves for so many years will have forever ceased. "There the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest."

Meeting the Immigrants—Good Work of the N. W. C. T. U.—Kindness to the Stranger

ALMOST important feature of American misssionary activity is that of "Work among Foreigners," conducted by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Miss Willard said of it: "It is vital to the future of the Republic;" and a United States Commissioner once declared this meeting and greeting of immigrants at our chief ports as one of the most valuable agencies of relief, reform and good government.

Mrs. S. F. Grubb, Chanute, Kans., has been for fifteen years the head of this department of the National W. C. T. U., and under her direction Miss M. L. Orr has been for the past eight years in charge of the New York branch, with headquarters at 9 State street, or at the Barge office, where the immigrant ships unload. To know what this mission means one should be present when the great vessels come in, bearing thousands of passengers, strangers to our land. There are people seeking loved ones here and knowing not how to find them; there are mothers with children hanging to their skirts, babies in their arms, little ones crying for milk and bread, and they, through ignorance even when possessed of funds, are often unable to get what they need. Speaking strange tongues, a poor bewildered flock they are, herded in the "pens," which are sometimes so crowded that it is almost impossible to walk through. In some of these enclosures, they are waiting for friends, or for funds to take them to different points. In another are cases demanding special inquiry; in a third are people who must be returned. Some are very cheery; some are patient; others are fretful; and others still are wicked and profane; the Barge officers have their hands full. The crowded stations of excursion passenger trains do not present such trying tasks and problems to authorities and baggage-men.

MISS ORR DISTRIBUTING TRACTS AMONG IMMIGRANTS AT THE BARGE OFFICE

TALKING TO THE STRANGERS IN THEIR NATIVE TONGUES

Miss Orr meets every shipload, and stands as the representative of a great organization of women to give these immigrants a friendly greeting to our shores, and to render aid and comfort wherever needed. Good second-hand garments are given those who come to us insufficiently clad in winter from a warmer climate. She provides bread for the hungry, procures milk for crying babies, sends letters and telegrams for new comers to their friends in this country, takes charge of young girls, waifs and little stow-a-ways, comforts the unfortunate, and seeks to be a real friend to the stranger. Sometimes parents die on shipboard and little orphans come to land; the sick and the broken-hearted come; the desperate and the wicked come. Those who have to be returned often go back with little gifts and remembrances of kindness that may help them to be and to do better.

In addition to the friendly greetings with which all are met, Miss Orr puts into their hands little leaflets in their own tongues, with such titles as "Welcome to the Stranger," "Warnings against the Saloon," "Kind Advice of a Friend," "How to Be Good Citizens," "Advice to Mothers on Social Purity," etc., thus meeting these people who are so soon to be citizens of our republic with some kind of intimation as to what a Christian nation expects them to become. About 10,000 leaflets in eighteen languages are distributed monthly. The importance of impressing immigrants in some way with the responsibilities of American citizenship is grave, for in fourteen states of our great commonwealth, men over twenty-one years of age can, in one year, by filing their intention to become citizens at some future time, exercise the full privileges of the ballot and vote on all national, State, county and municipal issues. Is it not of great consequence that Christian missionaries should inform them as to the duties and privileges of citizenship and not leave this education to the saloon?

Miss Orr has been in this work so long that she recognizes any nationality at a glance, and the Italian, Spaniard, Russian, Syrian, Pole or Greek, finds instantly in his hands a little intelligible message in his mother-tongue, and hears a womanly voice giving kind salutation in it. A simple thing to do, but it often brings glad tears to the eyes of the strangers. While not comprehending or being able to sustain a conversation in all these languages, Miss Orr has "caught up" enough to understand and make herself understood in regard to simple wants.

Many touching incidents occur in connection with this work; as once when a steamer bearing over a thousand steerage passengers had come in, and Miss Orr, pausing from work for those who seemed most needy, said to a woman whose baby was crying, "I am sorry for you," and the woman, bursting into tears, exclaimed: "Thank God for one kind word." Another proffered a dime in gratitude "for one kind word."

This work is sustained by an appropriation by the N.W.C.T.U., which covers the missionary's salary, and by voluntary contributions of charitable people who recognize the need and importance of it and subscribe funds for the printing and expressage of leaflets. Some thoughtful friends send boxes of good, clean garments prepaid. For one or two years, when the N. W. C. T. U. was under financial strain, the missionary salary was kept up by contributions sent in answer to prayer. All inquiries regarding the work will be promptly answered if addressed to Mrs. Grubb or to Miss Orr.

The New Heart

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 6. Ezek. 36 : 25-36
Golden Text, Ezek. 36 : 26

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

EZEKIEL was [illegible] especially prepared of God for his prophetical office. He was called to see and to discover to his people the exceeding sinfulness of their sin against Jehovah. And that he might bear the awful revelation, God had given him a vision of the glory of Christ, and of the "cherubim of glory," wonderful types of those created human beings who have become conformed and united to him. It is as though God could not lay upon any human being the awful burden of seeing sin as he sees it without first giving him a view of what God can do for sinful man through his redemption. We find the cherubim in Rev. 4 : 6 even in the midst of the throne, sharing his reign with Christ. Ezekiel must also be made, in a special way, part and parcel of his message. He must in vision, eat the roll of the book which contained his message (Ezek. 2: 8 10 ; 3: 1-4), and he must also bear the iniquity of the house of Israel and of the house of Judah upon him (Ezek. 4: 1-8) : and in his eating and drinking, in his home life, for he must not mourn even when his wife died (Ezek. 24 : 15-24) : he must be a living sacrifice, existing only for God and for his people.

In the whole of God's dealings with his ancient people, not one reason is found on their side why God should have mercy upon them. The only reason alleged is for his holy name's sake. Do we understand why the first petition which the Lord Jesus taught his disciples should be, "Hallowed be thy name?" In telling of coming mercy he says, "Say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God, I do not this for your sake, O house of Israel, but for mine holy name which ye have profaned . . . And I will sanctify my great name which ye have profaned . . . and the nations shall know that I am the Lord, saith the Lord God, when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes." "We be Abraham's seed" (John 8: 33), was no sufficient argument. Have we professing Christians not profaned the name of the Lord by our unchristlike spirit, words and deeds? Let us learn our lesson from Israel, and let us ask for mercy and for grace, not for our sakes, but that the holy name of our Lord may be glorified, that he may have his rights.

Israel was scattered in judgment, and none can gather Israel together again but he who scattered them. The Zionist movement shows that the heart of the poor among the Jews is towards their own land, but the gathering themselves together according to their own ideas, while it is a fulfilment of Zeph. 2 : 1, is not what the Lord speaks of here in Ezek. 36 : 24, although it may be a preliminary gathering. God says, "I will take you from among the nations, and gather you out of the countries, and will bring you into your own land." Whether he deals with Israel as a nation or with any individual, Jew or Gentile, God must separate his own—they must be a marked, peculiar people—"a people for his own possession" (I. Peter 2 : 9, R. V.), at the disposal of none other. Those who would be consecrated, and yet be appreciated and esteemed by those who are not consecrated, ask an impossible thing. Because we are the children of God, therefore, the world—whether among God's children or the unconverted—"knoweth us not, because it knew him not." We cannot be the followers of him who was despised and rejected of men, and especially by the most religious men of his time, the Pharisees and scribes, without being despised and rejected with him.

"And I will sprinkle clean water upon you." Is not this the Word of God, Old Testament and New? "Now ye are clean," said our Lord, "through the Word that I have spoken unto you" (John 15 : 3). "And ye shall be clean from all your filthiness, and from all your idols I will cleanse you." When God shall turn his [illegible] heart which cannot see it in the wrong, and has need of cleansing, which is sensitive to itself and hard as a rock towards God, succumbs to the new heart, and God takes it away and gives "a heart of flesh," which has the tenderest conscience, and is always willing to take the last place and the least. "And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them : the tendency of the new heart is to please God . . . And ye shall be my people, and I will be your God."

Lesson Points

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

AMONG the first company of prisoners carried off to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, was Ezekiel, then probably about thirty years of age or less. Like the other prisoners, he belonged to the aristocracy of the Jewish nation, and appears to have been a priest. The exiles were well cared for, though, doubtless they had not the luxuries to which they had been accustomed in Jerusalem. Left in comparative idleness, Ezekiel in his house on the banks of the River Chebar, brooded over the condition of his people. He saw clearly that their misfortunes had come through their unfaithfulness to God, who would have protected them and prevented Nebuchadnezzar despoiling the nation, if they had not given themselves to sin. Thus Ezekiel, in Babylon, was declaring the same message that Jeremiah was then preaching in Jerusalem. Even then, after all their misfortunes, the people were pursuing the same fatal course. Far away in Babylon, Ezekiel heard of their doings and besought them to repent and reform, lest a worse evil come upon them. Already they had felt the weight of Nebuchadnezzar's hand : the flower of the nation was in exile ; but they had still their city and land left to them, and they had their beautiful temple in which to worship God. If they continued to sin against him, he would surely punish them still more severely. Their land would be taken from them, their city would become a ruin and their temple would be destroyed. Ezekiel is appalled at the blindness and perversity of his people. He sees the same disposition among the exiles around him. They had no sympathy with his beliefs, and, we gather, from incidental allusions, that they persecuted him, so that it became dangerous to speak openly to them, and he was obliged to limit his preaching to those who came voluntarily to his house. Finally, his prediction was fulfilled. Nebuchadnezzar laid the land waste, scattered the people, destroyed the city and burned the temple. Was that to be the end of the nation? Ezekiel thought not. He saw in prophetic vision a change taking place in the distressed people. He saw a few of them turning to the Lord and becoming the nucleus of a new nation. He [illegible] God blessing them, accepting their repentance, writing his law in their hearts, giving them right spirits, and, when they were fit for it, restoring them to their land. It is believed that Ezekiel prophesied these [illegible] about the year B. C. 592 to the year B. C. 570 or twenty-five years, and that his book has come down to us practically as he wrote it. It is full of weird imagery, of strange winged creatures, of wheels and curious symbols, doubtless the result of impressions received in his waking hours from the winged, sculptured images, half man, half beast, in the great palaces of Babylon. These appeared to him in his dreams and became symbols of heavenly things. But apart from these, the one message, applicable to us in these days, as to the people for whom he wrote, sounds clear and distinct : that if the backslider will return to God, he will be welcomed, and God will restore him to his favor and renew his heart.

Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you. Under the Mosaic law, a person who became ceremonially unclean by touching a dead body, or in some other way, recovered his cleanness or fitness to join in public worship, by having the priest or some other person sprinkle him with water. A vessel of clean water was brought in, and the priest took a bunch of the light feathery hyssop and dipped it in the water and shook it over the unclean person. This was not to remove physical impurity—washing would have been necessary for that—but to signify the ceremonial cleansing. Just as Christ told Peter, when the impulsive disciple desired that his hands and his head be washed as well as his feet—that he whose feet were washed was clean every whit—so the sprinkling was an acknowledgment of the man's need of heart-cleansing which God confers. The wedding-ring now in use, probably had a similar origin. It is symbolical of a fetter, and, when it is put on, the wife is no longer free to associate with men on the old terms, but is bound to one man as long as she and he shall live. Her limbs are not fettered, but the band around the one finger indicates the marriage bond. So the sprinkling of a few drops of water indicates the cleansing which affects the whole being.

A new heart also will I give you. There is no other way to get a new life. Outward reformation is good, but it is not enough. As long as a man loves sin in his heart, he is not safe. Dr. Banks describes an artesian well in South Dakota, which when it was sunk, gave beautiful, clear water. It was thought a success, but the bed it reached was not good. After a time clay came up with the water, and in a little while nothing came up but thick, blue clay, which choked the well. So it is with the heart. If the heart is bad, it will sooner or later show itself in the life. Mr. Moody's illustration of a man settling on a farm is well known. The man is getting water from a pump out of a well which was dug by a former owner. A neighbor sees him and tells him not to drink that water. It contains fever germs and they will kill him as they killed his predecessor. But the man looks at the water and says it looks all right ; it is clear and sparkling. All that is needed is to paint the pump. Many men think that all that is needed to be a Christian is to have the life right, to leave off evil habits and to avoid sin. That is necessary, too, but the need goes much deeper. A new heart is needed, and that God promises to give to every one who seeks the blessing prayerfully and earnestly.

Venezuelan Arbitration

IT is an interesting and may be a useful coincidence that, while the international Peace Congress at the Hague is discussing the possibility of arbitration as a means of averting war, an actual example of arbitration should be in progress in Paris. It is the case of dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela, touching the possession of certain lands lying between the frontiers of Venezuela and British Guiana. After a delay of almost three years since Mr. Cleveland's bellicose message startled the world with a menace of war between this country and England, the tribunal to arbitrate on the dispute has assembled and the arguments of the counsel have commenced. The meetings are held in the foreign office of the French Government in the room in which the Spanish-American Peace Conference was held, and in the same room the tribunal which adjusticated the Bering Sea dispute held its sittings. It is a long, narrow room, gorgeously furnished, with handsome crimson leather chairs in gilt frames. On a dais raised at one end of the room are five massive gilt chairs for the arbitrators, with a table in front of them. Below them are six long tables for the counsel and the clerical staff. From a brilliant blue ceiling depend magnificent gilt chandeliers. A more appropriate room for an assembly so distinguished could not have been assigned. The arbitrators are Professor de Martens, of Russia, who is practically the umpire in whose hands the final decision will doubtless rest. The other four are two Americans, Chief Justice Fuller and Mr. Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court, and two Englishmen, Baron Russell and Sir Richard H. Collins. The English side of the case is in the hands of Sir Richard Webster, and the Venezuelan side will be presented by ex-President Benjamin Harrison. Both these eminent counsel are assisted by other distinguished lawyers, among whom, on the Venezuelan side, is Gen. Benjamin F. Tracy. The secretaries, clerks, etc., make up an aggregate of persons engaged in the arbitration of about forty. A photograph of the group, as they appeared in the quadrangle of the French Foreign Office, appears on this page. As the President of the Venezuelan Commission is a member of the Congress at the Hague, we may hope that the latter body may learn from him how simple and reasonable the system of arbitration is and may take measures to provide for it among all nations, and so prepare the way for that time, which is surely coming, when all disputes will be peaceably decided by an all-wise Judge.

He shall judge among many people and rebuke strong nations afar off (Micah 4 3).

A Burglar's Humanity

A remarkable incident, showing a burglar's tenderness of heart, occurred in Brooklyn, N. Y., on the night of July 4. Provided with skeleton keys and the usual tools of his nefarious business, a burglar entered a flat-house, in Quincy Street. He removed his shoes, so as to make no noise, and proceeded to examine the flat. In one room he found a child, sleeping in a crib, and close at hand a woman asleep on a couch. They were both sleeping so soundly that his entrance did not disturb them. Quietly, and deftly he cleared the tables of valuables, ransacked the bureau drawers and searched the trunks. Such articles as were suitable for his purpose he deposited in a bag on the floor, and had a valuable collection of spoons, watches and other portable property ready for removal. It was necessary, in order to reach his exit, for the burglar to pass again through the room in which the two sleepers lay. As he passed the child's crib he saw the little one, a golden-haired girl, about two years old, in a paroxysm of whooping-cough. The little creature was choking and needed immediate assistance, but the mother was sleeping the heavy sleep of exhaustion, and was unconscious of her child's peril. To arouse her involved the abandonment of his plunder, possibly detection, and a long term of imprisonment, but to allow the child to die before his eyes was more than he could bear. His better nature prevailed. He went to the sleeping woman, shook her gently, and pointed to the child. She was on her feet in an instant, and at the child's side. It was not until the remedy she administered had given relief, and her darling was resting quietly, that she realized what had occurred. The man who had aroused her was gone, but on the floor was his bag of plunder, and his shoes which he had dropped in his flight. These articles, and the disorder in the rooms sufficiently explained the object of the man's opportune presence in the flat. The woman's husband, who is a policeman, is anxious to catch the man who broke into his home, but the mother is willing to forgive that injury for the sake of the service he rendered in saving her child's life. The promise of similar oblivion for past sins, which have been forgiven, but can never be forgotten by the saved sinner is held out to those who will work to save others:

Let him know, that he who converteth a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins (James 5:20).

Two French Statesmen

Very significant is the fact that the two men whose portraits appear on this page should at this time occupy the most important offices in France. M. Waldeck Rousseau is the Premier, and the Marquis De Gallifet is Minister of War. The Cabinet, of which they are the chief members, does not please either of the two extreme parties in the French legislature, but it is composed of a vastly superior body of statesmen to those of the Cabinet of M. Dupuy which it succeeds. M. Dupuy was so thoroughly an opportunist minister that he had no political principle that he would not abandon to retain power. The new Premier, a distinguished lawyer, is a man of clearly defined political standing, belonging to the progressive Republican party, who has not sought office and must make considerable pecuniary sacrifices to accept it. He can be trusted to maintain the supremacy of the civil power over the army, which is a difficult thing to do in a country in which military glory is a passion. The crucial appointment in his cabinet at this juncture is that of Minister of War, because the approaching trial of Dreyfus must involve an arraignment of the chiefs of the army, and it will be an extremely difficult matter to secure for him a fair trial. If he should be acquitted, as now seems probable, his vindication will be practically a condemnation of the officers in the army, whom it may be necessary to punish. These matters will be under the control of the Minister of War, and it was therefore necessary to have for that post a man in whom the army had confidence, and who had the courage to punish its chiefs if required. Such a man he has found in Gallifet, a pronounced conservative, with monarchist sympathies, whose severity in dealing with the communists after the capture of Paris in 1871, proved his vigor and determination. It is now in modern nations as it was in ancient times, the people like rulers who do what they believe to be right, better than rulers who cringe and fawn and are ready to do anything that is popular.

An Odd Claim Rejected

A Colorado farmer who fought in the Civil War has failed in a suit for damages. It appears that during the war his crops ripened. As he was not on his farm to harvest them, they spoiled, and he estimated his loss at $23,033. It was not disputed that if he could have secured the crops and sold them he would have realized that amount, but he is told that there is no appropriation out of which he can be paid for the crops. In entering his country's service he was obliged to make sacrifices and it would be impossible for the Government in every case to give compensation. They, however, who make sacrifices in the cause of Christ are assured of present as well as future reward.

There is no man that hath left house or parents or wife or children for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in the present time, and in the world to come life everlasting (Luke 18 30).

The "Paris" in Harbor

To the surprise of her owners and the public, the salvage company employed on the steamer Paris, which was stranded on the Manacles on May 21, has hauled the steamer off the rocks and taken her to Falmouth in safety. Even the men at work were astonished at their success. They were trying to slew the vessel to the eastward, so as to facilitate the operations of the divers, when she moved more freely than was expected and finally floated off the rocks into deep water. The three salvage boats which were attached to the steamer towed her to Falmouth, where they ran her on a sand-bank, where temporary repairs may be made to her hull, so as to take her to Southampton dry-dock for a thorough overhauling. The company of salvors who did this great work is German. They loaded the stern of the vessel with five hundred tons of granite, which caused her bow to rise in the water. At the same time a channel was made for her by blowing up with dynamite the rocks on which she rested. Captain Watkins, the commander of the vessel, has publicly acknowledged that the wreck was due entirely to his own mistake. He reckoned that only five hours had elapsed since leaving port, when it was really six hours, and he was consequently near the rocks at a time when he believed himself eighteen miles away. A mist which hung over the land prevented the discovery of his mistake in time to avert the catastrophe. The local inspectors have suspended his certificate for two years. Captain Watkins feels the disgrace acutely, but he acknowledges the justice of his sentence. Though he was not guilty of any wrongdoing and was a most conscientious commander, his mistake had consequences so serious that it could not be overlooked. The fact may serve as a lesson to those who think that the unbeliever, if he is only sincere will escape punishment at the bar of God.

If ye believe not that I am he ye shall die in your sins (John 8: 24).

THE NEW PUBLIC SCHOOLS OPENED—FILIPINO CHILDREN SINGING "AMERICA" ON THE FOURTH OF JULY

A FILIPINA OF MANILA

THE MAIN CANAL OF MANILA—HEART OF THE FILIPINO CAPITAL

A MESTIZA-JAPANESE TYPE

VERY interesting news is coming to us from the Philippines. On July 2, public schools opened in Manila with fully 5,000 children in attendance under American instruction. Gen. Otis has undertaken to make attendance compulsory, but the natives are, as a rule, anxious to have their children educated; they have contended ineffectually in the past for free public education, and, it is believed, will eagerly avail themselves of the opportunities provided. English is to be taught, and Spanish and American festivals observed. The Fourth of July was celebrated in Manila with great pomp, all nationalities participating in what the Filipinos call the "la fiesta of North America." Hundreds of boys and girls, Filipinos, Spaniards and Chinese from the public schools, dressed in their best clothes, and each carrying an American flag, sang "America" in a curious mixture of dialects. Chaplain Knudsden, of the Washington regiment, read the Declaration of Independence. There were fireworks, speeches, bands, decorations everywhere, and the foreign ships and consulates, including the Spanish, raised their colors in conjunction with the Stars and Stripes; newsboys shouted Fourth of July editions. At the Luneta, a band of 100 natives played American airs.

A NATIVE BAND PLAYING BEFORE A RESTAURANT IN MANILA

Free public education must of necessity accomplish great good in the Philippines. There has existed for years under Spanish rule, an appropriation of some $30,000 for provincial schools, and a training seminary for teachers at Manila. But teachers were not well prepared, their salaries were very meagre, and their collection involved an extraordinary amount of costly "red tape;" the friars [illegible] officio school inspectors; and [illegible] not of a character to confer [illegible] trations of a school in Ma[illegible] as compared with reports received concerning our new schools.

Prof. Schurman, of the United States Advisory Commission, recently returned to Manila from a [illegible] Southern Islands, reports the intelligent and substantial citizens there as eager for an American protectorate, and the masses anxious simply to be let alone. The Professor says many of the towns are in possession of small bands of Tagalogs, and the people fear to indorse American rule until we bring the Tagalogs to recognition of our supremacy. The President of San Nicolai, Cebu, said: "We want peace, food and prosperity. We do not want to fight." In Mindanao and the islands of the Zulu and Visayan groups, our Commissioner was received with honors by citizens and municipal authorities in the principal towns. He conferred at length with the Sultan of Zulu, who received him in the royal audience chamber, his bodyguard of stalwart, fierce-looking Moros around him. The Sultan expressed a desire for peace and a good understanding with the United States. The two Sultans of Mindanao are subject to the Zulu ruler. The Moros are Mohammedans; they are great fighters, ner at once amusing and pathetic. It will be Christianity's task to make new missionary gateways to the great East by awakening these people to a sense of their

and the peace-loving villagers in the islands dominated by them have suffered much from their depredations. It will be fortunate for them if through education we can direct their energies into better channels. Gen. Lawton and Prof. Worcester were heartily welcomed in the province of Cavite, whither they recently went to assist in the organization of civil government. In all of these towns public schools will be established as rapidly as possible. It is to be hoped, and naturally believed, that industrial training, which is becoming so marked a feature of our own public school system, will be included in our efforts to educate the Filipinos.

Before our day of occupation, Dr. Worcester, thoroughly knowing and liking the islanders, declared: "With all their amiable qualities, it is not to be denied that the civilized natives are utterly unfit for self-government. Their universal lack of education is in itself a difficulty that cannot be speedily overcome." In their behalf, as well as ours, we can but pray God to end the war there as speedily as possible, and so open the way for us to conquer them for Christ by love and Christian teaching. Missionaries, we are told, arrive at Manila on every ship. The appearance of a missionary, however, at Cebu was followed by serious trouble, the report spreading among the ignorant natives that Americans would compel them to give up their existing religions. Upon advice of authorities and in the interest of harmony, the missionary withdrew. But as natives learn our language and understand us better, their ignorant fears will be removed, and the soldiers of the Cross can enter upon a great work. This work will truly be among all sorts and conditions of men—among a medley of Chinese, Japanese, Malay, Spanish, Tagal, Negritos, races with social estates varying as widely as racial features. There is the Filipina of wealth in flowing robes and waist of costly pina cloth; and there are the flower-girls and mango-sellers with garments of cotton or hemp, and the Mangyan women with no garments at all, unless a few twists of bamboo cords may be so considered. And there are the tricky Chinese-Malay merchants of Manila with whom unsophisticated Filipinos bargain in a manner at once amusing and pathetic. It will be Christianity's task to make new missionary gateways to the great East by awakening these people to a sense of their obligations to each other, and to the supreme value of Christian faith and service. One of our pictures—the grave of Col. Lazelle—is only one of many sad reminders that the efforts to discharge our duties to these strange peoples have already cost us dear. Official reports indicate that the worst is past. Grave fears in regard to the rainy season have not been realized. Gen. Otis' statements as to the health of our "Boys in Blue" are reassuring. Our men are well-fed; have good surgeons and doctors, and good sanitary regulations are enforced. In all cities occupied by us, we have had a good cleaning up, and instituted many sanitary reforms, from which natives as well as ourselves reap benefits. The statement that the wet season in the Philippines, beginning in June, lasts three months, must be taken in an elastic sense, since the islands cover some sixteen degrees of latitude, and heat intensity and the seasons vary in different parts of the group. In Manila the mean annual temperature is eighty degrees, rarely rising above one hundred in the shade, or falling below sixty. Prior to the insurrection against Spain, Dr. Worcester, now of the U. S. Advisory Commission, who spent four years traveling from one end of the islands to the other, wrote that danger from epidemic diseases was comparatively slight. Of malarial fever (the doctor had it several times and lived to tell the story), he said that any of the several types might be easily shaken off if promptly taken in hand, except one, la perniciosa, "very local in its occurrence, and the places where it is known are shunned by natives and whites alike." "It has been shown," he continues, "in a number of instances that malaria was due to causes that could be remedied. Before the time of Gen. Arolas, Sulu was a fever-centre. By improving the drainage of the town and by filling in low places with coral sand, he succeeded in almost completely stamping out the disease. Still more striking results were obtained at Tataan, in Tawi Tawi, by an officer who had worked under Gen. Arolas in Sulu. The garrison at this point had suffered terribly, but after the forest was cleared away for half a mile around the blockhouse, and the ground thoroughly cleaned up, fever almost completely disappeared from the place."

... Our Roll of Honor ...

IN our issue of July 5th we promised to publish a Roll of Honor, embracing the names of all the friends who were good enough to send in six half-yearly subscriptions under the remarkably liberal proposition recently presented, with a view to introducing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD into at least 100,000 new homes. We have just undertaken to approximate the number of those who now merit this distinction, and we are happy to state that at least 10,000 of our subscribers have succeeded in becoming entitled to such enrolment and also to a copy of a divinity circuit, red under gold, large type Red Letter New Testament, "with all the words recorded therein as having been spoken by our Lord, printed in red."

This is exceedingly gratifying to us, as it demonstrates beyond peradventure what we have always maintained, that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are its best friends and its warmest admirers, and that in addition to this they are a generous, large-hearted, appreciative people, zealous of good works and who delight in helping along the Cause in which their hearts are so warmly enlisted.

We publish below the first instalment of our Roll of Honor, and this is to be followed in subsequent issues by much larger lists, until each and every one shall have received the recognition which was promised. Up to the time of this writing about 75,000 new subscribers have been secured within the last seven weeks, and we feel confident that before the last day set for the mailing of coupon subscribers —July 31—at least 100,000 new subscribers will have been secured, and, indeed, we should not be surprised if even 150,000 were sent in by our friends.

At the time this paper is put in the hands of our subscribers there will yet remain one week for energetic, well directed, enthusiastic, successful work, which, if turned to the best advantage, might result in the addition of ten times 10,000 for that one week.

Please bear in mind that every person sending in six half-yearly subscribers, dating from July 1st and expiring January 1st, 1900, at 25 cents each (provided those subscribers are not now on our books, and are not intended to take the place of any now on our books), will be entitled to mention in our Roll of Honor, and will receive, absolutely free of expense, a copy of the Red Letter New Testament, beautifully bound, in Divinity Circuit, as a practical expression of appreciation on the part of the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

If you have not retained the coupons which were sent out with the first issue of July, or if you have used them up and now wish to obtain still more subscribers, just write the names and addresses of such subscribers on a slip of paper and state that they are coupon subscribers, and we will accept them of you and credit you with them, just as though the coupons had accompanied the order, provided, of course, that they are mailed before August the 1st, 1899.

Remember we give one Red Letter New Testament for Every Six Coupon subscribers sent in. One energetic worker has earned fifteen Testaments.

By a large vote all the saloons of Berkeley, Cal., are closed, and the temperance people pledged $5,800 to the authorities to make good the loss on revenue. The University of California is now city is free from this source of temptation to the students.

Under the heading of the Inquisition, Spain was an indictable offense, punishable with imprisonment, while fanatical and atheistical publications were freely disseminated. That fact explains much of the religious condition of that unhappy country.

New York City will have an opportunity to hear the Apostle of Holiness, Rev. F. B. Meyer, of England, preachers, who will occupy the pulpit of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church. Rev. F. B. Meyer preaches August 6, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan on August 13, and Rev. R. A. Torrey on August 20.

Missionaries are encouraged by the progress they are making in Samoa, Manua and Tutuila. They have already made eighty converts, not from heathenism as the Christian missionaries do, but from ignorant men and women who had made a profession of Christianity.

The Gospel mass-meetings conducted by Evangelist Radcliffe at the Metropolitan Temple, New York, on Thursday evenings, have been a decided success. It is unusual to find in the summer months any church so crowded as this has been. On one Thursday recently Police Sergeant Ezra D. Strope attended the meeting and made a vigorous address.

The compilers of Appletons' Cyclopedia have made a list of American citizens who have given during the past six years sums of $5,000 and upwards to educational, philanthropic, missionary and other religious organizations. The aggregate of these gifts reaches the enormous sum of $203,800,000. This is a record of which we as a nation have a right to be proud.

A glowing tribute to American Christians was paid by the Bishop of Newcastle, England, recently. In the course of a sermon before the University of Cambridge he referred to what American Christians had done for India, and said: "Our descendants are likely to find some day that India when she has become a Christian country, will have owed her Christianity more to America than to England."

A distinguished Roman Catholic, writing in an Italian journal on the subject of the progress of Roman Catholicism in England, says: "The truth is that for [illegible] Catholicism in England has for several years been stationary, if not losing ground."

[illegible] of the British and Foreign Bible Society is having a sale of its issues in the Chinese empire entirely without any precedent. During ten months (January to October 15th) the [illegible] sale in China never exceeded 290,000, and the average was not over 250,000.

Rev. Henry [illegible], missionary on the Lower Congo, reports that in that region "more than 1,500 have been baptized. There are now 1,200 standing and serving the Lord. The line is sharply drawn between Christian and heathen, and there are about thirty schools, all taught by Christians. There are in all fifty [illegible] of great power in the work—conducting self-supporting pioneer operations."

Mr. D. L. Moody has issued the call for the General Christian Workers' Conference, to be held at Northfield, Mass., August 1-20. Among the speakers who have promised to attend are Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, Rev. S. A. Selwyn, Rev. F. B. Meyer, all of England, Rev. A. T. Pierson, of Brooklyn, Rev. H. C. Mabie, of Boston, and Rev. R. A. Torrey, and Mr. W. R. Newell, of Chicago. The accommodations for boarding are ample and pleasant, and the expense moderate. Applications should be addressed to Mr. A. G. Moody, East Northfield, Mass.

A religious census of a single district in New York City by the Federation of Churches gave some startling results. Fifteen thousand families were visited, whom two-thirds were natives and the remainder belonging to the thirty-two different nationalities. The church communicants are 57.9 per cent, among the mothers and 54.5 per cent, among the fathers. Those who have no church home number 48.3 per cent, among the Protestants, but only 12.2 per cent, among the Roman Catholics. This, in spite of the fact that there are fourteen Protestant churches in the district and only three Roman Catholic.

The Russian Government, concerned about the increase of drunkenness in the cities, has adopted a modified and tentative Gothenburg system in St. Petersburg. It has taken away from 25,000 shops the right to sell alcoholic liquors, and has replaced these by 5,000 establishments placed under the control of the state, and situated at equal distances apart. These establishments are directed by young women. The liquor is delivered in bottles to which is affixed a government mark. The consumer can obtain only one bottle in each shop, and if, when he visits another establishment, he shows the least sign of intoxication, no liquor will be served him.

The French Government, which is at last proposing to do justice to Dreyfus, has given another proof of its emancipation from clerical influence by issuing an edict of perfect religious liberty in Madagascar. This is a severe blow to the cause of Jesuitism in France, as it is a great step in the progress of Christianity in the island. The bitter persecution of Protestants, which was initiated at the time of the French conquest, and the shameless confiscation of the London Missionary Society's schools and property, form one of the darkest blots in the history of modern Roman Catholicism; and that this policy has failed is one of the signs that the era of Catholic oppression is doomed all over the world.

Aid for Texas Flood Sufferers!

NOW that the terrible floods in the Brazos Valley in Texas are subsiding, the widespread havoc done by the waters is beginning to be seen. The work of rescue is still going on. Calls for aid have been issued by the local and State authorities, and also by United States Secretary Wilson, of the Agricultural Department at Washington. One hundred thousand persons, chiefly cotton planters and laborers, are in great distress, and it is absolutely necessary, if further loss of life is to be averted, to send abundant supplies at once. Representative R. H. Hawley has issued an authorized statement in which it is estimated that the losses by the flood will be between $25,000,000 and $40,000,000. Twenty populous towns and thousands of farms have been desolated. All work animals, stock cattle and vegetation have been swept away. Multitudes are practically helpless. The press, commercial bodies, and authorities of every city in the Union are appealed to for aid.

Responding to the public appeal for relief, and in view of the great urgency of the need, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent the following telegram to the Governor of the afflicted State:

BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK, July 13, 1899.

HON. J. D. SAYERS, Chairman, Austin, Texas:

You may draw on us at sight for $1,000 as our contribution toward relief operations, and we offer the State of Texas the use of $10,000 for six months, without interest, the money to be expended immediately and exclusively for the relief of flood sufferers and to be refunded to us within six months.

LOUIS KLOPSCH, "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

To this message Governor Sayers wired the following answer:

AUSTIN, TEXAS, July 13, 1899.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," NEW YORK:—

Very many thanks for your liberal contribution for the relief of the flood sufferers of Texas. It is fully appreciated, and will be gratefully remembered by our people. I draw upon you to-day for One thousand dollars as directed. I feel indeed greatly obliged to you for the offer of the Ten thousand dollar loan, but the plan that has been adopted, and will be pursued, renders it unnecessary to borrow money. I again renew my thanks for the donation.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS, Governor of Texas.

As many of its readers would doubtless wish to have a share in this relief work, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will receive, acknowledge and forward all contributions that may be sent to it for that purpose. Money so sent will be distributed to the sufferers through the Committee of which Governor Sayers is Chairman.

Ostrich Farms in the West

The Ostrich in America—In the East—Strange Mothers—Model Fathers

AMONG all the Bible birds—the doves, the eagles, the hawks, the ravens, the peacocks of "goodly wings," and the twitting sparrows—none hath such strange ways as the ostrich, which "is hardened against her young as though they were not hers," "which leaveth her eggs in the earth and warmeth them in the dust and forgetteth that the foot may crush them or that the wild beast may break them." So fleet of foot that "what time she lifteth up herself on high she scorneth the horse and his rider." Of prodigious strength, she is extremely timid, and flies from the sight of a man whom she could crush with one blow of her mighty two-taloned foot.

Until recently, the ostrich was known to us only in literature and as a wonder in zoological gardens, but within the last twenty-five years, ostrich-farming has become a profitable industry in California, and feather-plucking and clipping comes around as regularly as sheep-shearing. For this performance, the birds are driven into separate pens, long bags are slipped over their heads, they are securely held by men standing behind them (an ostrich kicks to the front), and the snipping and plucking begins.

In its native wilds this bird herds with zebras and antelopes. An ostrich is eight feet tall; a flock seen at a distance in the desert looks like a drove of camels. Their domestic eccentricities are pronounced. The male sits on the eggs and takes care of the babies. In the desert he covers them at night, when there is no sun to warm them. During the day the hens, (a number lay in one nest, and around it), are expected to take turns in guarding the home and although strangely indifferent to maternal duties, they are occasionally killed by hunters while keeping faithful watch.

TYPICAL SCENE ON AN OSTRICH FARM, PASADENA, CALIFORNIA

The extinction of the ostrich is imminent in Asia and not improbable in Africa. The British Government, in Africa, is making strenuous efforts to prevent their wholesale slaughter. Heavy fines are imposed for killing and nest-robbing, and a tax of $500 is levied upon each full-grown ostrich exported. Yet Egypt alone ships annually about $1,250,000 worth of feathers. Independently of plumage, the bird is a mark for prey. To a limited extend, it is a beast of burden; and its flesh and eggs constitute an important part of the food-supply of natives in some sections. The egg-shells are employed as water-bottles; a Bush girl among the Bechuanas will carry on her head a kaross, or net, containing ten or more filled from fountain or river, the small openings at the end of each shell being plugged with grass. An ostrich egg weighs three pounds. The domesticated ostrich on Western ranches thrives in his new environment and at times displays affection for his keeper. Mothers are somewhat more considerate of their young than the ostrich of the desert, but even among tame birds little ones would fare ill were it not for the father's assiduous care.

Training Husbands and Wives

"I have trained my boys," writes an aged mother, "to help care for their sisters. When they made pennies, they took it as a matter of course that they must divide with Bessie and Mary. I think the proudest day in Jack's life was when he bought a whole dress for his sister. When my sons came to marrying age, each knew something about what it cost to support a womon. They also knew that certain measures of their time, interest and attention in a social way was a woman's due. I took care that the girls should have as good training along feminine lines. They were made to feel the responsibility of keeping their brother's clothes in order, buttons sewed on, rooms dainty, and, above all things, of entertaining the boys, making home sweet, merry and attractive for them. My girls knew by the time lovers came a-wooing what the cares and responsibilities of looking after a man's comfort involved. Knowing how to amuse, interest and inspire their brothers, they were better able to hold a husband true to his home when the glamor of honeymoons waned.

The New Baby and the Old

"The new baby has knocked your nose out of joint," said a thoughtless visitor to a little maid who was bending with delighted wonder over a baby sister. "You won't be mamma and papa's baby any more." The child sent up a cry, and for weeks feared the new baby as a usurper. The father and mother, with infinite patience, undid the mischievous work of the careless remark. They were painfully particular to give an otherwise unnecessary amount of attention to the older child for a time, and they called the newcomer "your baby" and "our baby," to her, until she felt a sense of proprietorship in it; after that, there was no trouble. It is difficult to say how much mischief is done by planting and fostering jealousy between members of a family. Rather train them to the Divine law of "in honor preferring one another."

Tim's Story

A tiny little man, with thin, emaciated face, and dark, wistful eyes, was clinging timidly to his teacher's skirts as she walked across the lawn at our Children's Home to the cottages Faith, Hope and Charity. "How many children are at home with mamma, Tim?" he was asked. "Five," he answered. "Two's kept." She was puzzled. Was it a case like the child in the well-known poem, who insisted "we are seven." Counting the little brothers and sisters in heaven? "Are there seven or five of you at home?" she asked Tim. "Five. Two's littler 'an me. Two's kept." "Kept where?" "At de station-house." "Are they grown?" "Naw'm. Dey's big boys. Dey's goin' to de 'formatory," with some degree of pride. Further questioning revealed the fact that his papa drank, that his mamma had to work so hard that she had no time to give to training her children; also, it was evident that poor, loving, clinging little Tim had a most unhappy time, and knew what it was to see his mother quail and weep. Let us, whose homes are not invaded by the demon of intemperance, pray for homes so afflicted, and by our influence and labor hasten the purification of our streets, the doom of the bar-rooms and the salvation of the children.

A Lonely Indian

Jacob Riis, the author, recently told a quaint, pathetic story of an aged Indian squaw, widow of an Indian chief. She traveled through the States, selling beadwork and baskets, became stranded in New York, found friends, and is nearing her last hours in a comfortable room. Mr. Riis recently asked what she would like him to bring her. She said: "A parrot, red, green or white." Of course she has received it. Mr. Riis observes: "Her memories have long been the biggest part of her life. She cannot weave her mats any more, and the hours are dragging slowly. All the loveliness of her dreary life is pent up in the desire for a companion to share them, something living, with a voice, that will not come in and go away again and leave her." Loneliness and longing for companionship are qualities which should appeal to us as strongly as a cry for bread. Are any aged ones in our own households longing for companionship that we are not thoughtful to give?

LADY LOUISA MADELINA TIGHE

Remembers Waterloo

NOT many people now living can remember the Battle of Waterloo. Here is a lady who can. Lady Louisa Madelina Tighe, now residing with her grandson at Woodstock, Kilkenny, Ireland, was born 1803, daughter of the fourth Duke of Richmond, and was present, an excited schoolgirl, at the famous ball given by the Duchess of Richmond on that memorable night when one of the greatest battles of all history was fought within a few miles of the Belgian capital. Revelry was at its height when there came a sullen "Boom! boom!" crashing through the soft tumult of music and laughter. People paused in the dance, looked in each other's eyes and turned pale. Merriment was over. Gay gallants in dancing slippers hurried away to the field of carnage, and the morning light fell on many an upturned face that would never smile again. Women whose glittering garments had rivaled the butterfly's wing donned, ere another night, the widow's weeds of woe. In our schoolbooks many of us learned "by heart" to recite at "exhibition," the poet's graphic description of the mad gayety when

All went, merry, as a marriage-bell,
But hush! hark! a deep sound strikes like a rising knell!

The revelry interrupted for a moment, went on again until

Hark! that heavy sound breaks in once more
As if the clouds its echo did repeat;
And nearer, clearer, deadlier than before;
Arm! arm! it is—it is the cannon's opening roar!

Belshazzar's Feast, when Darius was at the gates of Babylon, and when God's servant, Daniel, read the handwriting on the wall, is the one other equally famous revel that was broken up by battle.

Child Play at the Hague

The way the Peace Congress has affected child-life at the Hague has ofttimes been amusing. It has furnished excitement for newsboys, who cried its proceedings to the best of their ability. The children hold play "Peace Conferences." The small boy also parades the streets as Czar of all the Russias, or with an imitation pig-tail as China's representative.

The Taming of a Street Arab

A Characteristic Incident of Child-Life in the Italian Quarter of New York City

IT was such an evening as is known only in the tenement district of a great city. All day the thermometer had been steadily climbing higher, and no relief was in sight. The dwellers of the Italian quarter were seeking refuge by the thousands on the roofs, the fire-escapes, and in the streets, while the wail of countless babies predicted a harvest of deaths on the morrow. Inside the homes, life was scarcely worth living. Few of the rooms had outside windows and in many of them washing and cooking had been going on all day over hot stoves.

I found old Pietro and his wife eating supper in a room which was suffocating with heat and so filthy that it almost took my breath away. The floor had certainly not seen a scrubbing brush for a year. Sheets and pillow cases were black, and the walls and furniture were decidedly greasy.

A dingy picture of the Virgin, with incense burning before it, was the only decoration. Two rabbits and a pigeon were making themselves at home around the room. The old man and his wife smiled at my evident apprehension while a big black object ran across the room from under the bed, and assured me that it was "only Johnnie's turtle."

Where was Johnnie? The faces clouded over as I asked the question. They had just returned from their daily toil in a tobacco factory, where their combined earnings were scarcely sufficient to keep soul and body together. They had no time to look after their boys, and Johnnie, the youngest, had not appeared for three days; but that was an old story.

"He verra bada boy; he no go to school; he no work. He stay out all night. Madonna mia, I kill him!"

The father had risen in his excitement and was pacing the floor, when the door opened and a shock-headed boy appeared.

He was grabbed on the instant and jerked into the middle of the floor. It was Johnnie, ragged and dishevelled, who was thus introduced with such scant ceremony. His hat had lost part of its crown, his bare toes were protruding from his shoes, and his ragged trousers were fastened with nails, for not a vestige of a button was left on his entire wardrobe. With a storm of reproaches and threats, the irate father threw him reeling into a corner of the room, where he struck his head on a sharp edge of the table; but he picked himself up with an air of stolid indifference, and sat down.

My heart went out in a great pity for the boy, as he sat there; for notwithstanding his forced bravado, there was an expression of childish innocence in the face, and a pathetic look about the mouth, that one only sees in unmothered children.

With as much tact as I could command, I proceeded to smooth the father's ruffled temper, and to put Johnnie at his ease by admiring his pets. He soon launched forth into a description of the knowingness of the turtle, and I found that this boy had a passionate fondness for all living things.

As I rose to go, I held out my hand and said, "Johnnie, I have a little garden at home, and I do wish I could find a boy who would come every evening and water it for me; do you know any such boy?"

A promise was readily made, and next afternoon Johnnie appeared at the home garden, with a face as clean as soap and water could make it. He had not bothered much with neck and hands—but no matter; there must always be a beginning.

After the garden had been attended to, we sat down on the back steps for a chat. I questioned him regarding his whereabouts during the three days he was absent from home.

"Well, it wuz like this, you see," he replied frankly. "We wuz shootin' birds in the park with a bean-shooter, when a feller said: 'Cheese it, the cop!' and me and another feller got pinched. The other feller's father got us out again, though."

"But, Johnnie, don't you go to school?"

"School!"—with a snort of contempt—"Ketch me! they chased me and I ain't goin' no more."

"Chased you? What do you mean?"

"Well, I've been to five schools and they all said I was too bad, and fired me. I don't like goin' to school, anyhow. I used to play hookey most every day. Now I don't have to."

"Where do you sleep, when you don't go home at night?" I asked.

"Oh! I sleeps in wagons or cellars or any old place."

"Now, I want you to come in," I said. "I am going to sew some buttons on your clothes."

"No you don't"—this with emphasis—"I'll only pull 'em off again to play craps with."

"Do you know, Johnnie," I said, looking down into his up-turned face, "I believe you are a boy to be trusted."

"No, I ain't," came the quick response, "nobody trusts me."

"Well, I am going to," I said. "Tomorrow we are going to have a party for the children here, and all the other boys will be at school in the morning. Some ladies have promised me cake. Now, you come in the morning and I will give you a basket, and I am sure I can trust you to bring that cake to me safe and sound."

"Hooray! I don't need no basket. I'll bring it inside of me," and with a whoop he made a dive at a passing butterfly.

Thus our friendship began. He brought the cake the next day without so much as looking into the basket. He became a member of our Home Garden and our Sunday School. He was also admitted into an industrial school from which he brought a "conduct card" every day to be signed. It showed that he was striving to do his best, and he was the happiest boy in New York the day he brought [illegible] his own hands.

At various times he has brought to me tokens of his regard in the form of rabbits, pigeons, sparrows, and, last of all, the pet turtle. This I declined, much to his disappointment.

Johnnie is not a model yet. The old Arab instinct is not quite overcome. But we are throwing around him the influences of our Home Garden, and just "loving him" into true and noble boyhood. The Home Garden is a new and successful work among the children, started by Miss A. C. Ruddy, in connection with her Italian work. It is a beautiful, home-like place in the midst of the tenements, where the children may come and read, sew or play games. Every day sees fifty or sixty children there in happy employment. The Home Garden occupies for the summer a house at No. 322 Pleasant Avenue, New York City, or the confines of the Italian quarter. There is a pretty lawn in front and a play-ground in the rear. There are piazzas, bay windows, etc., and inside are rooms for library, reading-room, sewing-room and play-room. The work is dependent on voluntary contributions for support. Miss Ruddy is making an effort to secure sufficient means to make it permanent, and she has already $700 pledged for that purpose. The balance she hopes to receive from friends who are interested in the effort to training the little Italian slum children and win them from the Arab-like life of the streets. She will gladly furnish all information that may be desired concerning the work and its character, and will answer any communications that may be addressed to her on the subject. Her entire time and means are devoted to the work, and she has associated with her several educated Christian young women as helpers. Her long experience as a city missionary among the Italians in New York has peculiarly fitted her for this labor of child-redemption, and her efforts are deserving of the heartiest support.

Many Souls Won to Christ

Progress of the Revival at the Gospel Tent on Broadway, New York

IF the Gospel tent "Glad Tidings," which Evangelist Pratt and his associates erected five weeks ago on a large vacant lot at Broadway and Fifty-sixth street, were to be extended to double its capacity, it could not accommodate the crowds that assemble there week-day evenings and Sunday afternoons to listen to the "old, old story" of Christ's mission and sacrifice. Before the work was a week old it became necessary to add a wing to the tent to accommodate the audience, but even that has been found insufficient. It is a novel midsummer spectacle to find these large audiences of business men, and people in every walk of life, crowding in to hear the Gospel preached at a time when a very large proportion of the population flee the city's heat for the refreshing breezes of mountain and sea shore.

In a spiritual sense, the tent revival is making remarkable progress. At every meeting, from eight to fifteen inquirers come forward at the invitation, and the fervent spirit which pervades all the gatherings gives assurance of deep and lasting results. Among the numerous conversions are some cases that may be called remarkable. A drunkard came forward one evening and requested prayer for his soul, and that he might be given strength to resist the temptation to his besetting sin. Some time afterward, he joyfully informed Evangelist Pratt that the prayer had been answered; he had stopped drinking that night and had experienced no desire whatsoever since. All previous efforts at reformation had failed. He had taken Jesus as his Saviour and was walking in his strength, being kept from day to day, and now felt a peace of mind and happiness he had never known before.

A woman who for five years had been a degraded victim of the opium habit, knelt with the other inquirers. She was greatly moved and shed tears of repentance. With her mind in a turmoil she left the meeting. But the Gospel seed had not been sown in vain, for, while she was seated in church the next day, and before the service had begun, the truth penetrated her soul and the cloud lifted. She afterward came back to the tent and told the workers of the great change that had come into her life, and how the burden of sin and weakness had been entirely removed.

Still another case was that of a young man belonging to a wealthy family of high social standing. He came to the meetings and after considerable hesitation felt impelled to go forward. One of the workers greeted him cordially. The young man said he had long felt his way of life to be unsatisfactory; he had little taste for the hollow pleasures of worldly society. At the same time all his early training rebelled against an open profession of religion. His mother and all his people would bitterly oppose such a step on his part.

The evangelist heard him patiently and then asked him to kneel beside him in a short prayer.

"I cannot kneel," said the young man, in evident agitation. But even while he spoke his better nature triumphed, and he sank to his knees. After the prayer and a short talk he was greatly comforted, and, with no trace of his previous hesitation, declared his determination to take Christ as his Saviour. He left the tent full of the joy and peace of believing, and on several occasions since has testified at the meeting in a manner which leaves no doubt as to the reality of his conversion.

These are only a few of many similar instances that might be cited to show the character of the work and its results. The plain, simple Gospel, unvexed by the differences and disputes of sects and schools, is set forth by earnest seekers after souls, and the people, as of old, "hear it gladly." Mrs. Russell Sage, at the conclusion of one of the services a few evenings ago, said to one of the workers: "If Christ were in this city today I believe he would be doing some such work as this."

During the past week Rev. R. A. Torrey, of the Moody Training Institute, Chicago, preached in the tent, having come from Northfield for that purpose. Ballington Booth, Rev. H. M. Wharton, of Baltimore, Md.; Evangelist Schiverea, Rev. Jas. Francis, Second Avenue Baptist Church, New York; Rev. Mr. Denman, from a leading Presbyterian church in Michigan, were among the other speakers.

Jokers Discomfited

A Drinker and Swearer who Became a Model Christian Sunday School Superintendent

IN the little community of Red Lick, in Bowie County, Texas, some changes had been going on in church work and these involved the election of a new Superintendent in the little Sunday School established by the

SUPERINTENDENT LEWIS AND HIS SUNDAY SCHOOL

American Sunday School Union. Several worthy names were suggested. In the community, there was a careless element which set little value on religion, and certain members of this faction decided to play a practical joke on "the religious crowd," as they denominated those who took an active spiritual interest in church and Sunday School work.

Pete Lewis was a noted character in Red Lick—a hard drinker and swearer, big-muscled and strong, and a man of great determination. He was regarded as an "ugly customer," and was certainly the last man in the place to be suspected of religious principles. Among the element in question he was decidedly popular, and was known as a "good fellow fond of his glass" and a "man of his word." To put the church-going people to confusion and disturb things generally, the thoughtless crowd resolved to nominate Pete Lewis for the vacant post of Sunday School Superintendent. They had of course no expectation of electing him; but the thing was "too good a joke to miss," they declared, and so his name was put up in due form.

But they had reckoned without their host. To Pete it was very far from being a joke; he grasped at it as the golden opportunity of his life. Unknown to his fellows, the grace of God had been at work in Pete's rude breast and he was sick, in heart and soul, of the useless, aimless existence he had been leading. He had received in his boyhood a good training from excellent parents, and to a fair education added a large fund of natural ability which now stood him in good stead. He did not repudiate the nomination, nor did he strive to get the place; he simply waited.

The "good joke" miscarried and to the consternation of his former associates Pete was chosen as Superintendent. On assuming office a complete transformation of the man seemed to take place. Modestly yet without hesitancy he set to work, and in a very little while had won the hearts not only of the entire Sunday School but of the congregation as well. He was, and is to-day, a model Superintendent, firm, capable, courteous, with every bearing and mark of the Christian. For Pete is a Christian and a striking example of the transforming power of grace in the human heart. Even those who, years ago, suggested him for his present position as a "good joke" have long since been compelled to acknowledge their mistaken estimate of him, and to express sincere thankfulness that their folly, instead of ruining a Sunday School, was overruled by a superior Wisdom and made a means of good instead of evil.

Drifting

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Aug. 6

Eph. 4:14; James 1:1-8

THE single word chosen for the topic never probably in any period since Christ came, characterized the religious life of so many of his people as in the present day. It is useless deny ing the fact that Christian men, and some of the best and most respected Christian men, are drifting. This not in matters of conduct and character, but in matters of dogma. The eternal verities of right and justice and truth and righteousness are unmoved. The men who have drifted most are no more disposed than they were when they were orthodox to lie or steal or lead immoral lives. Possibly a lengthened period of drift might in one or two generations lead to a laxity of the mor[illegible] but it has not come to that yet. The drifting most conspicuous is that of abandoning belief in doctrines more or less explicitly taught in Scripture. In the first decades of this century, when doctrines of Election, Free-will, Predestination, Sublapsarianism and other doctrines of that kind were the chief subjects of religious discussion, the combatants hurled passages of Scripture at one another's heads, and those who were hit had to show that there was mistranslation, or that the passage was modified by the context, or by the circumstances of the people to whom it was originally written. It must be explained away in some fashion or the contestant must acknowledge himself defeated.

Alas, that kind of argument no longer holds. It is not now sufficient to cite some isolated text in order to prove a doctrine. Men listened to a theologian who proved his point by Scripture, and afterwards to a theologian who proved the exact contrary by Scripture, and they began to doubt the usefulness of an authority which could be made to read in two exactly different ways. Then came the higher critics with their theories of the building-up of the Bible, contending that a large part of the Book we so venerate was composed of the myths of the Jewish people and that the words which we had accepted implicity as the very words of God, were the words of fallible men like ourselves which had been edited and revised time and again. So, men felt the ground which had seemed like a rock under their feet, slipping away and they knew not where to stand. And their position was made worse by the conduct of teachers who came wildly to the defense of orthodoxy. When a man does not believe, when he has begun to doubt, the way to save him is to convince him that the thing he doubts is true and reasonable, but teachers of authority, General Assemblies, General Conferences and such like took the other, and always fatal, course of fulmination. They threatened excommunication; threatened, as far as they were able, perdition to the doubter; demanded that he believe, or say that he believed, on penalty of ecclesiastical trial and condign punishment. Even the secular press has taken up the cudgels. A series of particularly silly articles in a New York daily journal, have appeared on the same side. No man was ever in sincerity brought back from doubt to faith by such measures.

Thus the drift has gone on, and the current is increasing in force. Many a man earnestly and conscientiously desiring to be right, looks ruefully at his dwindling creed and asks himself, with apprehension, where the end will be. To all such there ought to be on the part of other Christians a true and sincere sympathy. Few have sought doubt voluntarily, and they are far from happy in it. If any one can help his brother to stop drifting and to return to his faith, he may render him inestimable service. And such return is possible. With the belief in the existence of God as a starting-point, which no man of reasonable mind can doubt, the structure of faith may be built up. He who believes in God must recognize the duty of worshiping and serving him. The next step in the process comes with prayer, for God does reveal himself to every seeking soul. It is still true that he who will do the will of God shall know of the doctrine. As it was with the lepers who as they went, were cleansed, so the teachable spirit ready to obey Christ and do his will gets blessings by the way, that become his own and has the personal conviction which no specious argument can ever shake. Like the blind man whose eyes Christ opened, he may not be able to answer the objections of sceptics nor solve the difficulties which trained logicians may raise, but he answers: "Whether this be so or not, I know not, but one thing I know, whereas I was blind, now I see." So the drifting man may find his way back by the road of obedience and his experience will give him that peace which the world cannot give, neither can it take away.

The Neighbor at Our Gate

A GREAT deal of our social happiness and a great deal of our moral happiness is connected with the neighbor at our gate. We are told it is our duty to love him, and to do to him as we would he should do to us. To be true and just in all our dealings with him. To bear no malice nor hatred in our hearts to him. To keep our tongues from evil-speaking, lying and slandering, and not to covet anything he has. Now, if we take our neighbor to be he whose garden touches our garden, and whose house is nearest to our house, and whose social interests are the same as our social interests, it is often a very hard thing to love our neighbor.

There is a Jewish proverb which says that if we have learned to love our neighbor, we have learned to love our enemy, and so have fulfilled the whole law. Without either contradicting or endorsing this proverb, we may as well candidly admit that it is frequently very hard to love our neighbor, just because he is our neighbor. If he only lived ten miles away from us, it might be easy to love him. For human nature hates compulsion of any kind, and we are not often permitted any choice in this duty. We choose our husbands and wives, our friends and acquaintances and servants, but our neighbors, as a general thing, we cannot choose. They are put in this relation to us without our consent, and we naturally have the feeling that we could have selected much more agreeable people to live next door to us.

THEN again, neighborhood excludes those particular forms of intercourse which nourish and cherish friendship—living under the same roof, and writing letters. If people live, and eat, and talk, and walk, and ride together for a few days, they will know more of each other than if they lived seven years within bowshot. Under the same roof night and day, they will soon find out whether they like each other or not. If so, they will take care to meet again; if not, they will take care not to meet again. But as a general thing, we do not ask our neighbors to stay a week or two with us; neither do we sit down and write them letters. And yet letter-writing is the very school of love and friendship. Our pens are ready to say our noblest and kindest thoughts, and then we are morally and honorably bound to live up to them.

THERE are also many small, every-day things which make it hard to love our neighbor—things so small, that we don't like to mention them; but each, exerting a specific influence against hearty goodwill—petty jealousies about flowers, and fruits, and vines, and cuttings, and garden decoration; horses, carriages, dogs, and little personal peculiarities, that are not like our peculiarities; and therefore irritating; the tattle of servant men and women; the ill-advised comparisons of acquaintances; local honors and preferments; church differences and difficulties; or perhaps even a piano, which a neighbor persists in playing until midnight, or in the early hours of the morning — all these things would not be in the way of mutual kindness, if our neighbor was only a friend, and lived out of our sight and hearing.

Such questions as these, however small intrinsically, are serious enough in the country, and become more so when only the thin walls of city houses divide us from our neighbors. Then we speedily find out, that a mutual interest in a common chimney, or a common drainage, does not give us patience to bear our neighbor's music, or our neighbor's children. We feel that leases are not Christian ties, and though for some time, morality and good manners help us to endure things cheerfully, in the long run, we are apt to break down and remonstrate.

No wonder Christ made the loving of our neighbor so prominent a duty; and the Jews in considering the fulfilment of it the whole law, were not far wrong; for if we love not our neighbor whom we see, how shall we love God whom we see not? To show mercy to our neighbor, to help him in trouble, to nurse him in sickness, to lend him money if he needs it, to join him in defending local or church interests, these things are not very difficult; but to love him! that is a hard commandment.

None of us live unto ourselves. Whether we will, or not, we unceasingly and unconsciously act and react upon one another. It is said that the shadow of the Apostles sheds silent virtue upon the sick, laid in their path; and the shadow of a godly, kindly life, will be sure to fall with virtue upon the neighbor at our gate. Our faces must radiate the sunshine of our hearts; our feelings be warmly human: we must breathe around us an atmosphere healthy and exhilarating, and then, if we do not make a single expression of our good will, yet will our neighbor be conscious of it. For Love is justified of Love, and the natural converse is, that it is of no use to say kind words if we do not feel them. We may smile and flatter and entertain, but our neighbor will not be won unless there is truth at the bottom of our professions. He will not, perhaps, be able to say why he does not trust; but he has the instinctive feeling that we are not sincere.

WHATEVER our words and actions are, we may depend on this fact, that our unconscious influence will be absolutely true. Our neighbor will only believe that we love him, when he feels it; and it is in this way that, as a rule, we all get just what we deserve. The language of the lips deceives, the gifts of the hands deceive, but the language of character—the silent influence we radiate—never deceives. And for good or evil we never cease radiating this influence. We cannot live in the world and not exert it. We cannot grow in spiritual life unless we do exert it in its noblest aspects; for the career of every soul demands that its moral elements should be immersed and mingled in the social atmosphere surrounding it.

Who is our neighbor? Christ has answered that question in the parable of the Good Samaritan. Let us, however, take care that we do not play the Good Samaritan without the oil and the two pence; for it may not fall in the way of many of us to love the heathen who dwell at the ends of the earth, but we can all love the neighbor at our gates. And if we find it a hard discipline, we may turn to the book written by Christ's nearest relations, and get strength for the effort, in the assurance it gives us, that if "we learn to love our neighbor, we learn to love our enemy, and so fulfill the whole law."

Amelia E. Barr

God's Loving-Kindness

What could we do on earth to-day
Without God's loving-kindness?
It smooths the roughness of our way,
And leads us in our blindness.

'Tis better than our life so dear,
And all on earth we cherish.
Without His love would be but fear,
And all our hopes would perish.

My lips shall praise thee, thou most high,
Through all this life so fleeting.
Until my time shall come to die,
In thee my love completing

An Indian's Opinion of Whiskey

Young Chief, of the Umatilla tribe of Indians in Oregon, has begun a campaign against the "white man's firewater." He has published a letter, in which he declares that whiskey "makes all the trouble on the reservation." He writes:

Dear Believing Friends. White people to day I am a going to tell you and to let you know about all my trouble of the Indians of Umatilla Reservation, and that you white people give me troubles because you white people give that whiskies to the Indians, and you give me that trouble about whiskey, and all my friends they had the same trouble. If you would come out and see my trouble, and you would think sorry for persons. This trouble, and dear friend it be long to full of white people, and I wish himself Washington would come out and see us of the Indians of Umatilla Reservation, Oregon, Washington, he think Indians are good from Umatilla; no need, only a few are good Indians, and I am sorry of my friends, I am afraid it be no more a few year more, and I think it will be no more Umatilla Reservation. Dear friends, I wish you be kind and would help me, if please, dear friends, that is all for this time about trouble, from trouly dear kind friend, YOUNG CHIEF.

This intimation that the vile traffic in drink is killing off his tribe is exceedingly pathetic. Young Chief explains, in conversation, that even the boys of his tribe are learning to drink. Many of his Indians are opposed to liquor being brought to the reservation.

The Umatillas are a tribe of "good Indians," and during the Modoc war they helped the government to capture the notorious Captain Jack and his braves.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Mother of Many, Galveston, Tex. Every one of my eight children and grandchildren wants to send a child of the tenements to your Fresh-Air Home. How much will it cost for them to do so?

Three dollars will give one child a ten-day's transportation back and forth, food, shelter, clothing, caretakers' attention, etc. Twenty-four dollars will, therefore, give eight children of the poor ten days each at our Fresh-Air Home.

Inquirer, Norwich, Conn. I read in a story some time ago of "the never-dying sacred fires of India," and again have seen mention of a fire that had burned uninterruptedly for hundreds of years. Is there actually such a fire or is the above allusion merely fanciful?

It is seriously claimed that fires consecrated by the Parsee priesthood hundreds of years ago, have never been allowed to go out. One of these sacred fires, it is said, kindled in commemoration of the voyage made by the Parsees when they emigrated from Persia to India, has been kept alive for twelve centuries. According to the statement, original ignition was by the sun's rays; the flame is fed five times every twenty-four hours with sandal-wood and other precious and fragrant materials.

S. P., Academy Corners, Pa. Ought there not to be a law to prevent people publishing Sunday newspapers which give details of crime and divorce cases with pictures? They do great harm to young people.

We think legislation would not do much good, even if it could be secured. Our hope lies in a better condition of public opinion. If once the people of any section became real Christians they would have neither time nor inclination to read such papers on the Lord's Day. They would no longer buy them and the publishers, losing their market, would cease to publish them. The experiment of issuing a Sunday edition of daily papers has recently been tried in England, but it failed because public opinion was against it.

C. M., Ervington, O. In what biography of Franklin can I find the story of his early infidelity and of his remembering the lessons of his childhood in ripe manhood, and becoming a brave defender of Christianity?

In the early part of his Autobiography (see chap. I) Franklin admits that from reading Shaftesbury he had become a doubter. In chapter IV. there are given his emendations on the Lord's Prayer accompanied by notes on Christian duty, which may be accepted as evidence of his changed views. He, however, admits only that he became a Deist.

W. W. H., Bluefield, W. Va. 1. Where was Daniel when his three friends were in the furnace (Daniel 3: 12-24)? 2. How did the King know that the appearance of the fourth was like the Son of God?

1. Several suggestions have been made. One of the most probable is that the King knew that Daniel would not worship his image and therefore not being able to spare a man who had proved his usefulness by interpreting his dreams, excused his absence from the festival. Another is that Daniel used his privilege of office to visit a distant part of the kingdom at that time. 2. He did not know. It was simply his way of describing great dignity and spirituality.

A Reader, writing on the subject of reading the Bible through in a given time, suggests that it may be made more interesting and enjoyable by a division. Thus, supposing that a person decides to read three chapters at a sitting, it would be better not to read them in order, but to begin with the first chapter of Genesis, the first Psalm and the first chapter of Matthew. At the next sitting, the second chapter of those books, and so on. This would make the reading more varied, and the same end would be achieved.

F. E. M., Lowville, N. Y. Does the passage about being unequally yoked with unbelievers (II. Cor. 6: 14) apply to a member of a church [illegible] indulge in cards, dancing, etc.? Ought he to to leave the church

We do not think the passage applies to such a case. We would rather advise his remaining, and by his example, by earnest prayer and by pleading with his fellow-members, try to win them to a more consistent life.

Constant Reader, Lexington, Va. Who originated the saying: "There is a black sheep in every flock"? Are there not exceptions to this, both

In ancient times there was a lawless tribe of marauding Turkomans, who adopted the black sheep as their standard and were known by that name. They were exterminated by another tribe, which, by way of contradistinction, adopted the appellation of "White Sheep." This may have given rise to the familiar phrase in its modern application. Of course, there are exceptions to the rule, both in flocks and families.

C. E. Wittlig, Marietta, O. Please tell me where I can obtain Luther's cradle hymn, or kindly print it if you have it?

In response to this and many similar requests, we print the following English rendering of the most popular stanzas of the Reformer's cradle hymn. Where fullest and most correct translation of the German words can be found we are unable to say:

Away in a manger, no crib for his bed,
The little Lord Jesus laid down his sweet head:
The stars in the heaven looked down where he lay,
The little Lord Jesus asleep in the hay.

The cattle are lowing, the poor baby wakes,
But the little Lord Jesus no crying he makes:
I love thee, Lord Jesus, look down from the sky,
And stay by my crib watching my lullaby.

W. R., San Antonio, Tex. Where is the so-called "Valley of Death" located, about which we occasionally read in the newspapers?

There are two, one a comparatively small oval depression at the foot of a mountain in Java, the atmosphere being loaded with deadly animals that have perished there, and human beings avoid it. The other Death Valley is in Inyo County, Calif., between the Paramint Mountains and the Amargosa range. It is much larger and deeper. Deadly gases issue from the rocks, and even in the coolest parts the thermometer often reaches 125 degrees F.

Frank W., West Buxton, Me. What you say may be true of some, but can hardly be so in a general sense. In any event, we must not judge others. A man yesterday a sinner, may to-day declare for Christ. Again, the world, and sometimes even near friends, may misunderstand and misinterpret motives and acts, and thus give to very worthy persons an undesirable reputation.

Jacob H., Johnstown, Pa. Is David's mother's name given in the Bible?

Some scholars have contended that Nahash (See II. Sam. 17: 25 and I. Chron. 2: 16), was the mother of David, but as Abigail and Zeruiah are mentioned, not as Jesse's daughters, but as David's sisters, it is held by other commentators as probable that they were the [illegible] husband, whose name was Nahash, and, therefore, David's sisters only on the mother's side. The Bible nowhere states the name of David's mother in direct terms.

[illegible] person once having taken a pledge never to read any more novels or even short stories, to read such books as the Iliad, Æneid, Shakes-

These works are not novels in the usual sense. They are among the grandest works of the greatest minds and most gifted imaginations the world has known. On the other hand, the novel is usually a work of fiction, written with a view to amuse or excite. Yet there are some excellent novels which can be read with advantage by any one. Ben Hur, is an instance, and In His Steps, is another. You have taken a pledge without discrimination, but having done so, you should keep it.

J. J. C., Ashland, O. There is unquestionably a great deal of truth in what you have written, but we cannot pose as judges of men's private lives. These are matters that belong to God and their own consciences. If they misrepresent themselves and take on "the livery of heaven" unworthily, they are to blame.

Frank J. Angel, Victoria, B. C., sends us these beautiful lines which, he writes, were "suggested on seeing the frontispiece of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 31."

Beside the flower-strewn grave she stops and slowly kneels,
With quiv'ring lips, but eyes bright with the tears unshed:
Her tight-clasped hands betray the agony she feels,
For heart and hopes lie buried with her hero dead.

Reader, Hastings, Mich. There are two—one at East Northfield, Mass., the other at Chicago

Edith V., Dayton, O. What is the origin of the [illegible] "sweetness and light"?

Swift, in his Battle of the Books, makes use of the expression in the line: "The two noblest things are sweetness and light."

It is true that God leaves man free to choose the evil or the good, but he exercises an influence over him, drawing him to the good. He [illegible] to a right decision [illegible] the right he helps [illegible] by his Spirit. He does not force men into his kingdom against their own will, but he exerts influences of many kinds to attract them to it. In the same way, the wars, accidents, wrecks, etc., may be the direct result of human negligence or wrong-doing, but we [illegible] as an indifferent spectator of the events in his world. There is an over-ruling Providence that turns evil to good results in spite of evil intentions on man's part. We cannot always explain it, and some providences seem mysterious, but we cannot be surprised at our not being able to fathom God's purposes. From what we do know, we must conclude that those we do not know are also good and wiser than we can conceive.

[illegible] salvation will be re-[illegible] Is this possible?

If, as seems probable, one of the most painful results of "missing salvation" is the reproach of an accusing conscience, it must be inferred that there will be some relief in the thought of good that was done in this life. In a sense, that relief might be called reward, but the overwhelming fact that salvation was offered through Christ and was rejected will, we should imagine, dwarf every other consideration into insignificance.

[illegible] referred to in John 18: 15? We have had a discussion regarding that verse in our Epworth League. 2. Is the name spelled Mayme pronounced the same as the one spelled [illegible]?

1. John is the disciple referred to, but the writer of the book, in order not to seem egotistical, speaks of himself in the third person. 2. Presumably so, as it is only a fanciful way of spelling the same name. There is no fixed rule for the pronunciation of proper names.

The younger brother of the Admiral

IF worldly honors and fame made up the sum of human happiness, Admiral George Dewey, the hero of the great sea-fight at Manila, and who is now returning home on his flagship the Olympia, would be the happiest of Americans. His history-making deeds in the Philippine archipelago have made him the people's idol, and in their generous admiration they are preparing for him on his arrival such a splendid series of receptions, afloat and ashore—including public dinners, presentations and addresses—as would have gladdened the heart of the greatest of heroes, even in the old days of Roman triumphs, when victors entered the royal city as conquerors with countless captives in their train. There is hardly an important city in the Union where some programme designed to do honor to the great admiral is not now under consideration. His welcome in New York—which will probably be the port of his arrival—will be a demonstration such as the present generation has never beheld. By naval review and military parade, thundering cannon, waving flags and streaming bunting everywhere; by multitudinous public assemblage to witness the hero's ride up Broadway to the Council Chamber, where certain patriotic formalities will take place, including the presentation of the city's freedom; by banquet, oratory and illumination and in various other effective ways, the population of the metropolis will express to the great admiral its appreciation of his genius, and its admiration at his brilliant career in the Eastern world. In other cities which he is expected to visit, similar honors await him. In Washington he will be feted by the highest officials, by Congress and by citizens generally. It is proposed to formally present him with a beautifully decorated sword on the steps of the Capitol building.

STATE HOUSE, MONTPELIER
The Dewey Statue will face the Ethan Allen Statue

These are only a few of the many features in the plans that have been arranged for honoring the distinguished commander when he arrives. His progress, ever since leaving Manila has been a series of ovations, and at every port where the Olympia has touched, Dewey has been the hero of the hour. He left Manila in poor health, his naturally robust constitution having suffered from the enervating climate of the Philippines and the tremendous nervous strain he had undergone in the critical stages of the war against Spain. It has been shown by his modest declination of public honors, dinners, receptions and the like, at various places, that the admiral does not estimate these at too high a value, and that he is wisely careful of his health. At Hong kong, Singapore, Colombo and Trieste, he was received with almost royal honors. He will probably make no stop at Gibraltar and will cross the Atlantic direct for home, without first visiting London, as our English friends had hoped he might be persuaded to do. It is his desire to avoid public functions as far as possible. His health is now said to be excellent, but he may stay in the Mediterranean ports several weeks longer. According to present expectations he will reach the United States early in October.

THE SCHOOLHOUSE IN MONTPELIER, WHERE DEWEY STUDIED IN BOYHOOD

In this issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD presents a number of photographic illustrations, which cannot fail to specially interest our readers at this time, in view of the early return of the hero of Manila to these shores. George Dewey, whose name is now ranked with those of the great ones in our nation's history, was born in 1837, at Montpelier, Vt. The house in which this famous Green Mountain boy first saw the light is still standing, and is shown in one of the photographs. His father was Julius Yeamans Dewey, a physician. The family originally came from Kent, England. It is interesting to note that the motto on the Dewey coat-of-arms is: Corona veniet delectis—"the crown comes to the deserving"—a motto which has had its most distinctive exemplification in the Admiral's career. As a boy, Dewey was daring and vivacious, a leader in all sports, yet steady and painstaking at his studies. On leaving school, he attended a military academy at Norwich, Vt., for three years, after which he went to Annapolis, where he was a classmate of Rear-Admiral Bunce. In 1863, he was a lieutenant on the frigate Mississippi, which was burned off Port Hudson, La., in March of that year, having been set on fire by the Confederate batteries. Dewey was the last man to leave the ship, and, as he did so, he saved the life of a wounded comrade, to whose rescue he bravely swam while bullets were thickly flying, and placed him upon a floating spar, from which he was taken up in safety. Dewey was commended by Admiral Farragut for his heroism. He was afterwards executive officer of the Kearsarge, and later received the appointment of commander at Annapolis. His whole career is an unbroken record of promotion for distinguished merit. In November, 1897, he was appointed as commander of the Asiatic squadron, and "the rest is history." His great victory at Manila Bay, was the result of forty years' arduous preparation.

At no time has he ever been heard to refer to it in the sense of mere physical triumph, though he appreciates to the fullest extent the importance to the nation of the victory he won. At the same time, Admiral Dewey is claimed, by those who know him best, to be a commander who would invariably prefer to adopt the peaceful methods of diplomacy, rather than resort to measures of force, unless the latter were unavoidable. His course in the Philippines, in the trying times after the battle of Manila, showed him to possess, in no inconsiderable degree, the qualities that go to make statesmen and great administrators. He has, however, no ambitions outside of his naval career, and it is improbable that he will ever be tempted out of the familiar environment.

Among the portraits in the group, on this page are those of the Admiral's two brothers, and his father. Admiral Dewey is a widower with one surviving son, who resides in New York City.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

... The Ivory Palaces ...

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Ps. 45: 8, . . All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces

AMONG the grand adornments of the city of Paris is the Church of Notre Dame, with its great towers and elaborate rose-windows, and sculpturing of the last Judgment, with the trumpeting angels and rising dead; its battlements of quatre-foil; its sacristy, with ribbed ceiling and statues of saints. But there was nothing in all that building which more vividly appealed to my plain republican tastes than the costly vestments which lay in oaken presses—robes that had been embroidered with gold, and been worn by popes and archbishops on great occasions. There was a robe that had been worn by Pius VII. at the crowning of the first Napoleon. There was also a vestment that had been worn at the baptism of Napoleon II. As our guide opened the oaken presses, and brought out these vestments of fabulous cost, and lifted them up, the fragrance of the pungent aromatics in which they had been preserved, filled the place with a sweetness that was almost oppressive. Nothing that had been done in stone more vividly impressed me than these things that had been done in cloth, and embroidery, and perfume. But to-day I open the drawer of this text, and I look upon the kingly robes of Christ, and as I lift them, flashing with eternal jewels, the whole house is filled with the aroma of these garments, which "smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

In my text the King steps forth. His robes rustle and blaze as he advances. His pomp and power and glory overmaster the spectator. More brilliant is he than Queen Vashti, moving amid the Persian princes; than Marie Antoinette, on the day when Louis XVI. put upon her the necklace of eight hundred diamonds; than Anne Boleyn, the day when Henry VIII. welcomed her to his palace—all beauty and all pomp forgotten while we stand in the presence of this imperial glory. King of Zion. King of earth. King of heaven. King forever! His garments not worn out, not dust-bedraggled; but radiant, and jewelled, and redolent. It seems as if they must have been pressed a hundred years amid the flowers of heaven. The wardrobes from which they have been taken must have been sweet with clusters of camphire, and frankincense, and all manner of precious wood. Do you not inhale the odors? Ay, ay, "They smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

Your first curiosity is to know why the robes of Christ are odorous with myrrh. This was a bright-leafed Abyssinian plant. It was trifoliated. The Greeks, Egyptians, Romans and Jews bought and sold it at a high price. The first present that was ever given to Christ was a sprig of myrrh thrown on his infantile bed in Bethlehem, and the last gift that Christ ever had was myrrh pressed into the cup of his crucifixion. The natives would take a stone and bruise the tree, and then it would exude a gum that would saturate all the ground beneath. This gum was used for purposes of merchandise. One piece of it, no larger than a chestnut, would whelm a whole room with odors. It was put in closets, in chests, in drawers, in rooms, and its perfume adhered almost interminably to anything that was anywhere near it. So when in my text I read that Christ's garments smell of myrrh, I immediately conclude the exquisite sweetness of Jesus.

I know that to many he is only like any historical person: another John Howard; another philanthropic Oberlin; another, Confucius: a grand subject for a painting; a heroic theme for a poem; a beautiful form for a statue: but to those who have heard his voice, and felt his pardon, and received his benediction, he is music, and light, and warmth, and thrill, and eternal fragrance—sweet as a friend sticking to you when all else betray; lifting you up while others try to push you down; not so much like morning-glories, that bloom only when the sun is coming up, nor like "four-o'clocks," that bloom only when the sun is going down, but like myrrh, perpetually aromatic—the same morning, noon and night; yesterday, to-day, forever. It seems as if we cannot wear him out. We put on him all our burdens, and afflict him with all our griefs, and set him foremost in all our battles; and yet he is ready to lift, and to sympathize, and to help. We have so imposed upon him that one would think in eternal affront he would quit our soul; and yet to-day he addresses us with the same tenderness, dawns upon us with the same smile, pities us with the same compassion.

There is no name like his for us. It is more imperial than Cæsar's, more musical than Beethoven's, more conquering than Charlemagne's, more eloquent than Cicero's. It throbs with all life. It weeps with all pathos. It groans with all pain. It stoops with all condescension. It breathes with all perfume. Who like Jesus to set a broken bone, to pity a homeless orphan, to nurse a sick man, to take a prodigal back without any scolding, to illumine a cemetery all ploughed with graves, to make a queen unto God out of the lost woman, to catch the tears of human sorrow in a lachrymatory that shall never be broken? Who has such an eye to see our need, such a lip to kiss away our sorrow, such a hand to snatch us out of the fire, such a foot to trample our enemies, such a heart to embrace all our necessities? I struggle for some metaphor with which to express him: he is not like the bursting forth of a full orchestra: that is too loud. He is not like the sea when lashed to rage by the tempest: that is too boisterous. He is not like the mountain, its brow wreathed with the lightnings: that is too solitary. Give us a softer type, a gentler comparison. We have seemed to see him with our eyes, and to hear him with our ears, and to touch him with our hands. Oh, that to-day he might appear to some other one of our five senses! Ay, the nostril shall discover his presence. He comes upon us like spice gales from Heaven. Yea, his garments smell of lasting and all-pervasive myrrh.

Would that you all knew his sweetness! how soon you would turn from all other attractions. If the philosopher leaped out of his bath in a frenzy of joy, and clapped his hands, and rushed through the streets, because he had found the solution of a mathematical problem, how will you feel leaping from the fountain of a Saviour's mercy and pardon, washed clean, and made white as snow, when the question has been solved: "How can my soul be saved?" Naked, frost-bitten, storm-lashed soul, let Jesus this hour throw around thee the "garments that smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

Your second curiosity is to know why the robes of Jesus are odorous with aloes. There is some difference of opinion about where these aloes grow, what is the color of the flower, what is the particular appearance of the herb. Suffice it for you and me to know that aloes mean bitterness the world over, and when Christ comes with garments bearing that particular odor, they suggest to me the bitterness of a Saviour's sufferings. Were there ever such nights as Jesus lived through—nights on the mountains, nights on the sea, nights in the desert? Who ever had such a hard reception as Jesus had? A hostelry the first, an unjust trial in oyer and terminer another, a foul-mouthed, yelling mob the last. Was there a space on his back as wide as your two fingers where he was not whipped? Was there a space on his brow an inch square where he was not cut of the briers? When the spike struck at the instep, did it not go clear through to the hollow of the foot? Oh, long, deep, bitter pilgrimage! Aloes! aloes!

John leaned his head on Christ, but who did Christ lean on? Five thousand men fed by the Saviour: who fed Jesus? The sympathy of a Saviour's heart going out to the leper and the adulteress; but who soothed Christ? He had a fit place neither to be born nor to die. A poor babe! A poor lad! A poor young man! Not so much as a taper to cheer his dying hours. Even the candle of the sun snuffed out. Was it not all aloes? Our sins, sorrows, bereavements, losses, and all the agonies of earth and hell picked up as in one cluster and squeezed into one cup, and that pressed to his lips, until the acrid, nauseating, bitter draught was swallowed with a distorted countenance, and a shudder from head to foot, and a gurgling strangulation. Aloes! aloes! Nothing but aloes. All this for himself? All this to get the fame in the world of being a martyr? All this in a spirit of stubborness, because he did not like Cæsar? No! no! All this because he wanted to pluck me and you from hell. Because he wanted to raise me and you to heaven. Because we were lost, and he wanted us found. Because we were blind, and he wanted us to see. Because we were serfs, and he wanted us manumitted. Oh, ye in whose cup of life the saccharine has predominated; oh, ye who have had bright and sparkling beverages, how do you feel toward him who in your stead, and to purchase your disenthrallment, took the aloes, the unsavory aloes, the bitter aloes?

Your third curiosity is to know why these garments of Christ are odorous with cassia. This was a plant which grew in India and the adjoining islands. You do not care to hear what kind of a flower it had or what kind of a stalk. It is enough for me to tell you that it was used medicinally. In that land and in that age, where they knew but little about pharmacy, cassia was used to arrest many forms of disease. So, when in my text we find Christ coming with garments that smell of cassia, it suggests to me the healing and curative power of the Son of God. "Oh," you say, "now you have a superfluous idea. We are not sick. Why do we want cassia? We are athletic. Our respiration is perfect. Our limbs are lithe, and on bright cool days we feel we could bound like a roe." I beg to differ, my brother, from you. None of you can be better in physical health than I am, and yet I must say we are all sick. I have taken the diagnosis of your case, and have examined all the best authorities on the subject, and I have to tell you that you are "full of wounds and bruises and putrefying sores, which have not been bound up, or mollified with ointment." The marasmus of sin is on us—the palsy, the dropsy, the leprosy. The man that is expiring to-night in the next street—the allopathic and homeopathic doctors have given him up, and his friends now standing around to take his last words—is no more certainly dying as to his body than you and I are dying unless we have taken the medicine from God's Apothecary. All the leaves of this Bible are only so many prescriptions from the Divine Physician, written, not in Latin, like the prescriptions of earthly physicians, but written in plain English, so that a "man, though a fool, need not err therein." Thank God that the Saviour's garments smell of cassia!

Suppose a man were sick, and there was a phial on his mantle-piece with medicine he knew would cure him, and he refused to take it, what would you say of him? He is a suicide. And what do you say of that man who, sick in sin, has the healing medicine of God's grace offered him, and refuses to take it? If he dies, he is a suicide. People talk as though God took a man and led him out to darkness and death, as though He pushed him off. Oh, no! When a man is lost it is not because God pushes him off: it is because he jumps off. In olden times a suicide was buried at the cross-roads, and the people were accustomed to [illegible] to me there may be at this time a man who is destroying his soul, and as though the angels of God were here to bury him at the point where the roads of life and death cross each other, throwing upon the grave the broken law and a great pile of misimproved privileges, so that those going by may look at the fearful mound, and learn what a suicide it is when an immortal soul, for which Jesus died, puts itself out of the way.

When Christ trod this planet with foot of flesh, the people rushed after him—people who were sick, and those who, being so sick they could not walk, were brought by their friends. Here I see a mother holding up her little child, saying: "Cure this croup, Lord Jesus! Cure this scarlet fever!" And others: "Cure this ophthalmia! Give ease and rest to this spinal distress! Straighten this club-foot!" Christ made every house where he stopped a dispensary. I do not believe that in the nineteen centuries which have gone by since, his heart has got hard. I feel that we can come now with all our wounds of soul and get his benediction. O Jesus, here we are. We want healing. We want sight. We want health. We want life. "The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." Blessed be God that Jesus Christ comes through this assemblage now, his "garments smelling of myrrh"—that means fragrance; "and aloes"—they mean bitter sacrificial memories; "and cassia"—that means medicine and cure.

According to my text, he comes "out of the ivory palaces." You know, or if you do not know, I will tell you now, that some of the palaces of olden time were adorned with ivory. Ahab and Solomon had their homes furnished with it. The tusks of African and Asiatic elephants were twisted into all manner of shapes, and there were stairs of ivory, and chairs of ivory, and tables of ivory, and floors of ivory, and pillars of ivory, and windows of ivory, and fountains that dropped into basins of ivory, and rooms that had ceilings of ivory. Oh, white and overmastering beauty! Green tree branches sweeping the white curbs. Tapestry trailing the snowy floors. Brackets of light flashing on the lustrous surroundings. Silvery music rippling on the beach of the arches. The mere thought of it almost stuns my brain, and you say: "Oh, if I could only have walked over such floors! If I could have thrown myself in such a chair! If I could have heard the drip and dash of those fountains!" You shall have something better than that if you only let Christ introduce you. From that place he came, and to that place he proposes to transport you, for His "garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces." What a place heaven must be! The Tuileries of the French, the Windsor Castle of the English, the Spanish Alhambra, the Russian Kremlin, are mere dungeons compared with it! Not so many castles on either side the Rhine as on both sides of the river of God—the ivory palaces! One for the angels, insufferably bright, winged, fire-eyed, tempest-charioted; one for the martyrs, with blood-red robes from under the altar; one for the King, the steps of his palace the crown of the church militant; one for the singers, who lead the one hundred and forty and four thousand; one for you, ransomed from sin: one for me, plucked from the burning. Oh, the ivory palaces!

To-day it seems to me as if the windows of those palaces were illumined for some great victory, and I look and see, climbing the stairs of ivory, and walking on floors of ivory, and looking from the windows of ivory, some whom we knew and loved on earth. Yes, I know them. There are father and mother, not eighty-two years and seventy-nine years, as when they left us, but blithe and young as when on their marriage day. And there are brothers and sisters, merrier than when we used to romp across the meadows together. The cough gone. The cancer cured. The erysipelas healed. The heart-break over. Oh, how fair they are in the ivory palaces! And your dear little children that went out from you — Christ did not let one of them drop as he lifted them. He did not wrench one of them from you. No. They went as from one they loved well to One whom they loved better. If I should take your little child and press its soft face against my rough cheek, I might keep it a little while; but when you, the mother, came along, it would struggle to go with you. And so you stood holding your dying child when Jesus passed by in the room, and the little one sprang out to greet him. That is all. Your Christian dead did not go down into the dust, and the gravel, and the mud. Though it rained all that funeral day, as you drove out to the cemetery, it made no difference to them, for they stepped from the home here to the home there, right into the ivory palaces. All is well with them. All is well.

It is not a dead-weight that you lift when you carry a Christian out. Jesus makes the bed up soft with velvet promises, and he says, "Put her down here very gently. Put that head which will never ache again on this pillow of hallelujahs. Send up word that the procession is coming. Ring the bells. Ring! Open your gates ye ivory palaces!" And so your loved ones are there. They are just as certainly there, having died in Christ, as that you are here. There is only one thing more they want. Indeed, there is one thing in heaven they have not got. They want it. What is it? Your company. But, oh, my brother, unless you change your tack you cannot reach that harbor. You might as well take the Southern Pacific Railroad, expecting in that direction to reach Toronto, as to go on in the way some of you are going, and yet expect to reach the ivory palaces. Your loved ones are looking out of the windows of heaven now, and yet you seem to turn your back upon them. You do not seem to know the sound of their voices as well as you used to, or to be moved by the sight of their dear faces. Call louder, ye departed ones! Call louder from the ivory palaces!

When I think of that place, and think of my entering it, I feel awkward; I feel as sometimes when I have been exposed to the weather, and my shoes have been bemired, and my coat is soiled, and my hair is disheveled, and I stop in front of some fine residence where I have an errand. I feel not fit to go in as I am, and sit among the guests. So some of us feel about heaven. We need to be washed, we need to be rehabilitated before we go into the ivory palaces. Eternal God, let the surges of thy pardoning mercy roll over us! I want not only to wash my hands and my feet, but, like some skilled diver, standing on the pier-head, who leaps into the wave and comes up at a far distant point from where he went in, so I want to go down, and so I want to come up. O Jesus, wash me in the waves of thy salvation!

And here I ask you to solve a mystery that has been oppressing me for thirty years. I have been asking it of doctors of divinity who have been studying theology half a century, and they have given me no satisfactory answer. I have turned over all the books in my library, but got no solution to the question, and today I come and ask you for an explanation. By what logic was Christ induced to exchange the ivory palaces of heaven for the crucifixion agonies of earth? I shall take the first thousand million years in heaven to study out that problem; meanwhile, and now, taking it as the tenderest, mightiest of all facts that Christ did come, that he came with spikes in his feet, came with thorns in his brow, came with spears in his heart, to save you and to save me. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." O, Christ, whelm all our souls with thy compassion! Mow them down like summer grain with the harvesting sickle of thy grace! Ride through to-day the conqueror, thy garments smelling "of myrrh, and aloes, out of the ivory palaces!"

Our Children's Kitchen

The Chef and the Help—Hearty Appetites and Wholesome Food—Happy Workers

VISITORS to our Children's Home are always pleased to have a peep into the kitchen; and William, our chef for six summers, takes pride in showing the clean pantries, the stores of oatmeal and flour, the wholesome ginger-cakes and cookies; also in explaining how much children can eat, and how economically a thrifty cook can provide bountiful and toothsome repasts for hungry tots. He points to cauldrons of bubbling savory stew, and says:

"The hundred quarts I've just sent in will disappear in no time. Some children eat like they are half starved when they first come up here."

"We have received children," said Miss Drane, Miss Collins' chief assistant, "who said they had not eaten a good meal for a long time, and whose emaciation, weakness and hunger seemed proof of their words."

When they have roast, many pounds

are required to satisfy the hunger of some 250 little guests around our tables. Many bushels of potatoes, rice and other vegetables are disposed of in the course of a week, during which effort is made to vary as far as possible a simple but abundant bill of fare. For desserts, rice and cornstarch pudding, tapioca dishes, and other simple, nourishing foods are highly relished by hungry tots. From 150 to 160 quarts of milk, and from 110 to 120 loaves of bread, are consumed daily. Their generous allowance of rich, sweet milk is a great blessing to the youngest and feeblest children. Going up on the boat, a wan, little man said: "Johnnie says they gives you milk up there. Does they gives you milk up there, teacher?" Answered in the affirmative, he continued to return for reassurances, asking with wonder-wide eyes: "Does they gives you milk up there? Sure, teacher?"

The kitchen help is largely selected from children who have been to our home summer after summer, who look upon it as home, and who, when they have passed the age limit of twelve years, ask to be admitted as help. The assistance we are thus enabled to render worthy, industrious girls and boys is a great blessing to them and their over-burdened parents. Frequently children used to work have shown themselves unhappy and ill at ease until set to little tasks, the doing of which made them feel at home. For these tots, William, with true kindness, invented various small duties, for which the Housemother, in a spirit of true motherly encouragement, gave them pennies. There was some profit, therefore, as well as fun, in peeling potatoes out under the trees, and doing other small chores while singing a merry song on the hillside. Many displayed domestic aptitude; interest was taken in training them, and they returned to their homes with lessons learned that would make them more helpful to parents.

The small sum of $3 gives one tenement child a ten days' outing; $6, sends two; $9, three; $12, four; $15, five; $35, twelve. Could $35 invested in any other way make twelve people happy for ten days; feed, clothe and shelter them; probably save life; and surely make some twelve children better forever thereafter because of the kindness shown and the good Christian influence exerted? Ezekiel's Vision

Golden Text, Ezek. 36 : 27

BY MRS. M. DANIELL

EZEKIEL had been overcome and conquered by the wondrous vision of the Lord in glory which he had seen, and he had yielded himself unreservedly up to his God, to speak or to be dumb as he willed, and to speak none other but his words to the people. He might not speak except when God spoke to him. Speaking of himself in the third person, he says, "the hand of the Lord was there upon him." Again this man of God insists that it is "the hand of the Lord," and nothing of himself, which opens to his view such revelations as it is given to him to name, of the sinfulness of man and the glory of his God.

Ezekiel, to be a prophet of the resurrection, must not be staggered when God showed him, not corpses, but the dried and scattered bones of bodies which had once been men, and asked him to decide, "Can these bones live?" Looking at them, with no germ or possibility of life in them, what should he say? He had prophesied about the new heart, and had believed that the nation of Israel should, without any appearance whatever of improvement in them, nevertheless be made by the direct and unaided power and grace of God, another people. And God's prophet believed that it should be even so. Now, Ezekiel, can dry bones live? He stood before the great truth that with God all things are possible. He had learned that he could do nothing, say nothing of himself: he could not of himself decide this question. "O Lord God, thou knowest!"

Now, Ezekiel, thou hast ever been obedient, thou hast spoken my words to a people who would not hearken unto thee (chap. 3: 4-7): now prophesy over these bones, and say unto them, "O ye dry bones, hear ye the Word of the Lord." And in his vision, as he announced, so it came to pass: There was a noise [or thundering], and behold an earthquake, and the bones came together, bone to his bone. And breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army.

Such is the vision, and again and again it has been accommodated, with much of the witness of the Spirit, to lost souls, "dead in trespasses and sins." Now let us go on to God's own interpretation: Then he said unto me, Son of Man, these bones are the whole house of Israel: not specially Judah, nor specially Israel, the two tribes or the ten: "Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim" (Isa. 11: 13). "Behold, they say, our bones are dried up and our hope is lost; we are clean cut off: Therefore, prophesy and say unto them, thus saith the Lord God, behold I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, O my people; and I will bring you into the land of Israel." This is no longer the vision, but a distinct literal message to the children of Israel.

Let us look to other Scriptures, which bear upon this one. In Rev. 20: 4-6, we read of those who in the tribulation have been beheaded because they "worshiped not the beast nor his image, and received not the mark upon their forehead and upon their hand, and they lived (were resurrected), and reigned with Christ a thousand years." Probably the most of these will be Jews; the church will have been caught up. There will therefore be children of Israel living and ruling upon earth in the millennium, who have died and been raised again. The members of Christ who have died will be raised again, and caught up to heaven; the pious Jews raised again to live upon earth, and to be a blessing to the nations. Isaiah says, "My dead shall live; my dead bodies shall arise . . . the earth shall cast forth the dead" (Isa. 26: 19, R. V.). This is a direct promise of resurrection to the pious Jews. Hosea says (6: 2, R. V.): "After two days will he revive us; on the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live before him." And the Lord says again (Hosea 13: 14, R. V.): "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death; O death, where are thy plagues? O grave, where is [or will be] thy destruction?"

The full acquaintance with God shall come upon united Israel, i. e., "they which shall be accounted worthy to attain to that age" after their resurrection. "Ye shall know that I am the Lord when I have opened your graves, and caused you to come up out of your graves, O my people. And I will put my spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I will place you in your own land; and ye shall know that I, the Lord have spoken it, and performed it, saith the Lord." Oh, how much we lose of God's truth when we spiritualize everything, and make it mean only the very little which we have experienced, instead of taking in its most literal sense all which our God tells us and waiting for him to open up, by his Spirit, from other Scriptures, that which is not clear to us. "Can these bones live?" What can the God of the resurrection not do? Whatever dry bone there may be in our households, our Christian or missionary work, in our own bodily weakness, let us, looking steadily to him who is invisible, hear him say to us, "Can this dry bone live?" And let us never say no. "Oh, Lord God, thou knowest."

The prophet was led on by the Lord in his vision, to learn by the two sticks which he was to make one in his hand, the power of his God to unite the children of Israel. And he was told, when the children of Israel should ask the meaning of all these things, he was to declare unto them the purpose of their God; to bring them out from the nations, gather them, bring them into their own land and make them one nation in the land. And then he recapitulates what he said in chap. 36, how God will cleanse them, and save them. "So shall they be my people and I will be their God."

THEY LIVED AND STOOD UP UPON THEIR FEET, AN EXCEEDING GREAT ARMY

Lesson Points

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

STRONG faith must Ezekiel have had in God's power and in his unchanging affection to have preached to the exiles in Babylon such a message as that in the lesson. Truly admirable is this extraordinary prophet thus striving to inspire his countrymen with the faith and hope that filled his own heart. We can imagine him meeting some distinguished exile on the streets of Babylon, and noticing his dejected, miserable countenance, trying to cheer him with the hope that Israel and Judah would again occupy their own land. The exile would reply that Nebuchadnezzar's armies held the land, and who was there that could drive them out? Ezekiel replies that God was able to do this. But even if they were driven out, the land was laid waste. Ezekiel says that God can enable his people to rebuild and restore the cities. But even if the land was cleared and restored, Jehovah's people could not occupy it. They were as a people practically dead; the national spirit was extinct. Ezekiel, mixing with the captives, finds that it is so. None among them had patriotism or hope of restoration; they were settling down in Babylon and did not expect that they or their children would ever again dwell in Palestine. Even if all other objections were removed and every obstacle to return was surmounted, there were none who had spirit enough to return. It is to this objection that the prophet addresses himself in this chapter. He describes a dream he has had of bleached bones lying on the earth. These bones represented a host of men, not only dead, but dismembered. There were not even the skeletons left: they had been broken up and scattered. Can these bones live? God shows him that they can, and the prophet in the strength of the vision goes to the exiles to tell them that dead as the national spirit is, scattered as the people are, God is able to restore their life and plant them again in their land. He was probably derided, but in the end his words proved true. When Cyrus gave the word, the men were ready to go and re-establish the nation.

They were very dry. When a beloved child is ill, what anxiety there is! How intently it is watched, how eagerly every sign of improvement is noted! A person coming in and looking at the child, predicting its recovery, would find attentive and grateful listeners. But when the child dies, what a change there is! The stranger standing beside the coffin can say little that will cheer and encourage them. But yet, the remains look so lifelike that it does not seem at all impossible that the body may live again. It requires, however, a far greater exercise of the imagination to think of a skeleton or a heap of dry bones becoming again a living, thinking, speaking being. That was the image set before Ezekiel to convey the lesson as to his people. It seemed impossible that those men could ever be reanimated with hope and spiritual life. They were like the heap of dry bones. So, it often seems to us, it is with some degraded, brutalized man. The spiritual nature of him seems dead. It does not respond to any appeal. His seems a hopeless case. Ezekiel's vision may encourage effort even there. He saw the earthquake shaking the bones into their places, and then the Spirit breathing life into them. Many a Christian worker has seen a spectacle quite as wonderful in the conversion of a degraded man.

Can these bones live? About twenty years ago, a tall, broad chested young man staggered up the garden path of a minister's house in Ireland and asked the minister to intercede with his family for him. He was ragged and hungry and he wanted food and clothes. Time and again his father had forgiven him, paid his debts, clothed him, obtained a situation for him and given him a new start. But the end had always been the same. Within a month he would leave his situation and go off on a drunk. The last time he had been warned that if he fell again nothing more would be done for him. And he had fallen. He knew it was of no use going home, but he thought if the minister would plead for him there might be a chance. The minister, however, had no faith in him. "You are beyond the reach of my faith," he said. The young man's heart sank, for the minister before this had always stood by him and advised his being forgiven. He went away with the idea of committing suicide, but an old friend of the family, a shipowner, saw him and offered him a free passage to America. He landed in New York, and, being absolutely without money, took the first offer of work that was made to him, which was to groom the horses of the Fourth Avenue surface cars. After his first day's work was done he went down the Bowery, intending to get some beer. But as he passed the Bowery Mission he heard a hymn being sung that his mother used to sing, and he turned in to listen. That night he heard that he was not beyond the reach of God's mercy. He had not much faith, but he asked for prayer. Somehow, he said afterwards, there came into his heart a belief that his drinking days were ended. He was doubtful, but as the weeks passed without relapse, the belief strengthened. Two years from the time that he first entered the Mission he was preaching the Gospel to other men, that had saved him, and two years after that he was the pastor of a church in Colorado, and he proved a most successful minister. On his first vacation he returned to Ireland for a visit, and the minister who had told him that he was beyond the reach of his faith invited him to occupy his pulpit for a Sunday. He consented and took for his text, "Can these bones live?"

Col. Ingersoll Dead

DEATH came suddenly to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, the famous leader of infidelity in this country. He had been suffering during some weeks from a slight indisposition which he thought would be easily cured by a few days' rest at his summer home at Dobbs Ferry, N. Y. There, surrounded by his family and friends, he was cheerful as usual, but still complained that he was not in full health. Neither he nor his relatives, however, thought seriously of his sickness. But on July 21, about midday, he walked into his wife's room, seated himself in a chair, and without a word, passed peacefully away. He was nearly sixty-six years of age and was a man of robust, vigorous frame and active habits. Almost from boyhood he had been noted for the anti-religious spirit which made him one of the famous trio of modern infidels. He had the wit of Voltaire without his acerbity, and the force and aggressiveness of Tom Paine without his coarseness. He had the misfortune to receive his early impressions of religion under a system of doctrine, which to a man of his temperament, was the most likely to prejudice him against it. His father lacked the tact and patience which might have given his son a better appreciation of the sweetness and light of Christianity. The lad grew up blind to the qualities of the faith, which, could he have seen them, ought to have won the respect of a heart so tender and affectionate as he undoubtedly had. He had that fatal lack of reverence, which, as Goethe said, neutralized every other fine quality. Added to this, he was a brilliant, rather than a deep thinker, and having a quick wit and a command of strong vigorous language, it was easy for him to win applause by a shallow misrepresentation of Bible truths. His pungent utterances thrilled men who enjoyed the piquancy of hearing things, which other men hold most sacred, denounced and ridiculed. But it was not Christianity that Ingersoll denounced; it was his own conception of it, which was an egregious mistake. Once in his life, he was induced, while at Kalamazoo, Mich., to look into the life of a church there, and when he saw how it was seeking to help men to a better life, he exclaimed: "It is the grandest thing in the country. I would join such a church as that, if its members would permit me." If he had only studied the Bible with an unprejudiced mind, he would have found that the work he admired in that church, was the true development of the spirit of the Book. He never had more than a superficial acquaintance with the Bible, and even that was acquired through jaundiced vision. This was proved by the fact that the qualities of love and generosity and kindness and charity, which he most lauded, are the very qualities inculcated by the Book, whose influence he did his utmost to undermine. Unhappily he succeeded in prejudicing many shallow minded young men against religion, by leading them to believe that his conception of it was the true one. There was so much that was admirable in the man that if he had ever discovered his mistake, none would have been more ready than he to deplore it, and all the irreparable mischief he did under its influence. Would that he had done so, and then even he might have said as did Paul:

I obtained mercy because I did it ignorantly in unbelief (I. Timothy, 1:13).

Light from the Body

A correspondent of the Electcical Age sends to that journal a description of an interesting discovery he has made. He says: "I have discovered the very interesting fact that the human body emits rays which act on a sensitive photographic plate. There is a distinct difference in the property of these rays and that of light. They pass through certain opaque substances while to others they impart vibration, and in this condition they act on the photographic plate. Before giving a description of my experiments I will briefly mention that it seems that not all persons emit rays of the same chemical energy. Some persons whom I tried, produced a strong while others only a faint impression on the film and others even none at all. But it may be that, had I tried these same persons the next day, the result would have been an entirely different one, because I made the observation on myself that at different times there was much difference in the chemical energy of the rays emitted by my fingers." This is an unexpected discovery as to the body, though it was known long ago, that spiritual light might come from a human being in whose soul God had kindled the heavenly light.

The sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world (Phil. 2: 15).

The Car Strikes

Labor troubles in Brooklyn, New York and Cleveland, O. have brought their usual accompaniment of hardships for the men, loss to the companies and inconvenience to the public. The trouble in Brooklyn affected nearly every street-car route in the city. Of about eight thousand employees, eleven hundred went on strike. The companies, by offering temporary extra pay and making promises of special privileges, induced the other men to continue at their posts. The men complain that while the letter of the law is observed and they work only ten hours a day, the spirit of it is violated by so arranging their trips that they have odd unoccupied hours in the course of the day, which are too short a period of rest to be put to any use. Thus from the time a man goes on duty in the morning, till the time he leaves at night, may be twelve or fourteen hours, although there may be an hour or two in the morning and another interval in the afternoon when his services are not required. Another grievance is the question of wages. Since the consolidation of the car lines took place, a uniform rate of pay has been adopted, each man receiving two dollars for a full day's work. This caused dissatisfaction among the men on some of the routes, as it was a reduction of sixty cents a day from the amount they had previously received. There were scenes of violence in many parts of the city, and in the early part of the week the service was suspended at night on several lines. A policeman, armed with his night-stick and revolver, was at each end of the car in the daytime, and at any sign of disturbance was prompt to act with his accustomed brutality. In order that the companies might have full protection, twelve hundred policemen were sent over from New York to assist the Brooklyn force, and it was remarked that they set a bad example to the Brooklyn officers of unnecessary cruelty. In New York the strike was less extensive. It was confined to the routes which are run by electricity, and only a small proportion of the men struck. The companies were able, by diminishing the usual number of cars sent out, to continue the service, though the long intervals between the cars caused much inconvenience to passengers. In Cleveland the conflict assumed more dangerous shape. Dynamite was used by the strikers and the militia was called out to protect the barns. It is a significant fact that in all cases the representatives of the companies decline to submit the dispute to the State Boards of Arbitration. They insist that "there is nothing to arbitrate." Their strength, of course, consists in the fact that there are so many men whose hard necessity makes them willing to take the places of the strikers, so that the companies can afford to let their old employees go. Conflicts of this kind, which cause loss and trouble to both sides, are deplorable and they would never occur if the spirit of Christianity animated both the employers and employees. The warning of the Apostle is as true now as when it was uttered:

The members should have the same care one for another; for whether one member suffers, all the members suffer with it (I. Cor. 12: 25).

Precious Wall Paper

An ex-officer of the Federal government, who has just returned from the Transvaal, describes a remarkable sight he witnessed in Johannesburg. It was a rude miner's cabin, like hundreds of others in and around that famous town. But its peculiarity consisted of the paper with which the walls were covered, which represented property worth many thousands of dollars. It appears that the miner on reaching the Transvaal, was employed on one of the first mines opened in the Barberton district. The company working the mine being short of ready money, persuaded the man to take part of his wages in shares. For many years the mine yielded little and the company could pay no dividends. After a time the miner became disgusted at wielding the pick all day for these nicely engraved but unproductive pieces of paper, and he left Johannesburg for another part of the country. His wife used the scrip with some odd prints and chromos to paper the walls of their living room. But one day a visitor from town took so lively an interest in the wall paper and was so anxious to buy it, the man made inquiries as to the company whose paper had appeared so worthless to him. To his astonishment, he found he was a large stockholder in one of the most profitable gold mines in the world. He did not continue working for a pittance after he made that discovery, but claimed the dividends belonging to him, which made him rich. There are many Christians who need to make a similar discovery. God has treasures of grace and joy that they might have if they would claim them:

He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things (Rom. 8: 32).

Feared Divine Vengeance

The surgeons in a New York hospital had a peculiar case to treat recently. A woman with her hands bandaged came to the hospital, in a state of agonized distress. She said her hands were paralyzed. The bandages were removed, revealing two distorted hands. The fingers were bent like claws and tightly interlaced. Every bone seemed out of joint and the veins twisted. The doctor knew at once that it was no case of paralysis, and he asked the woman what made her think she was paralyzed. Then she told her story. She said she had been getting her living for twenty years past as a beggar, and, to arouse sympathy, she had shammed paralysis. One day lately, a sweet-faced girl gave her some money, and in receiving it she had straightened her fingers involuntarily. Thereupon the girl had warned her that God might punish her for shamming affliction by making that affliction real. "And he has," the woman exclaimed in an agony. "When I awoke the next morning my hands were paralyzed as you see them. I cannot straighten them! They are dead! Oh, try what you can do for me!" The doctor perceived that the woman's fear was the cause of her affliction. He told her he could cure her and sent for some liniment, which he poured over her hands, rubbed them awhile, and then gave her a slight electric shock. He then told her she was cured and she opened her hands. It may be hoped that her scare will lead her to amend her ways. Like many other people who are not distressed by the thought that their sins will be punished in the next world, she was alarmed when she thought they were punished in this.

Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment; and some men they follow after (I. Tim. 5: 24).

The Picturesque Side of Sunday School Missionary Work

Illustrated with Photographs Taken by American Sunday School Union Missionaries Specially for "The Christian Herald"

A MARKETMAN OF SOUTH CAROLINA — BRULÉ SIOUX OF SOUTH DAKOTA — ON THE WAY TO SUNDAY SCHOOL, TEXAS

WHEN the Diamond Anniversary of the American Sunday School Union was celebrated in Philadelphia, in May last, many of the speakers who addressed that notable gathering were missionaries from the remotest quarters of the Union. Their work included much that was striking and picturesque—the very romance of home missions; at the same time, it showed not a few of the difficulties and discouragements that face the worker and frequently impede the spiritual progress of a neighborhood.

On these two pages we have presented a variety of scenes and experiences in the lives of American Sunday School missionaries in many States: on the plains, among the Indians, with the cowboys, among pioneers, in the sod-house of the prairies and in the neat, cosy dwelling of the prosperous ranchman. These might easily be multiplied, but enough has been given to indicate the classes of people with whom the missionaries have to deal.

In the seventy-five years of its labor, the American Sunday School Union has brought over four millions of children and youths into Sunday Schools. In the Northwestern district in five years, over 2,600 new schools were planted, over 100,000 visits were made to families, there were 1,687 professed conversions and 340 churches developed from the work in the same period. This record is very much like that of the results in other districts. If we take individual States, the result is equally encouraging. Thus, a single worker at Minden, Neb., reports 35 new schools organized in three years. Another, at Neligh, in the same State, in eight years organized 358 Sunday Schools in counties occupied by Americans, Germans, Irish, Russians, Bohemians and Indians. A worker in Minnesota has a record of 156 schools; one in South Dakota has organized 44 schools and another, 99; in one Illinois section, a worker in seven years has established 14 schools; one in Wisconsin has planted 140 schools in six years; one in Michigan, in a few months, organized 17 schools, and others in like proportion. Last year, 1898, 65,000 neglected children were brought under Bible instruction in the undenominational Sunday Schools solely through the efforts of the American Sunday School Union

This beneficent work is one with which very many readers of this journal are already familiar. There is not, in the whole range of Christian effort, a nobler or worthier mission than the shepherding of the neglected little ones — those stray lambs who through misfortune, poverty or pitiable environment, are deprived of the opportunities for religious training which the other children of the Republic enjoy.

Letters from some of the missionaries in the field afford a glimpse of a few of the hardships and the compensations of the child-saving and soul-winning labor in which they are engaged. The story of Crooked Creek (Neb.) Sunday School is thus told by E. B. Stevenson:

Some twelve years ago, while I was a missionary in Nebraska, I was in a community called the Crooked Creek neighborhood. I think it was very properly named, because the people were as crooked as the creek. They had neither church nor Sabbath School. Each time a school was organized the people of the other denomination seemed to feel it was their Christian duty to kill it.

I called upon the superintendent of a Sunday School which I had organized a few miles from there, and asked his opinion about organizing a school. He at once advised me not to go. I went to another superintendent on the other side of the neighborhood, but the encouragement was about the same as the first. I started home about decided not to try. when, passing one of the neighbors, I drove in and asked him if we organized a school, would he do what he could towards maintaining it. He at once wanted to know if I had seen his neighbor on the hill. I told him no. "Well," said he, "you go and see him, let me know what he says, and I'll see."

I then went to the neighbor on the hill and he wanted to know what the neighbor had said in the hollow. I then proceeded to be willing to do almost anything I wanted. Finally I thought the time had come to take a vote. I asked all those who were in favor of having a Sabbath School and would do what they could to maintain it to raise their hands. I raised both of mine to help them out, but not a hand went up. I urged them, plead with them, and still no hands. Finally I looked direct to a man who had partly promised me that he would work for it. and said: "Is there no one?" He thought I was going to name him out, so he raised his hand. As soon as he had done so thirteen other hands went up. I then said "all those opposed raise your hands," and immediately eleven hands went up. As we had the majority in favor of the school, we organized. I afterward learned that it soon broke up.

About a year later I went into a neighborhood in an adjoining county to organize a Sabbath School one weekday evening. As I stepped up to the little frame school-house door a lady came up and said, "How do you do, Brother S.?" I looked at her and said, "I don't believe I remember you." "Have you forgotten me already? I used to go to the Sunday School at Crooked Creek. I do thank God for that Sunday School and I want to tell you about it." She, her husband, son and daughter had all been converted.

Mr. Geo. E. Mize, another missionary writes this interesting letter from Alabama:

In April I organized a school for Mr. S——, of New York. The community was without preaching. Less than a mile from the Sunday School is a whiskey still. In two families I found fourteen fatherless children. I saw their mothers plowing to provide for their families. Poverty prevails throughout. The people were hard to convince that my visit among them meant good. I was the first missionary who had been among them. I do not believe that there could have been found five dollars in the whole community. I was enabled to supply them with a barrel of clothing, as well as some literature for twelve months. I have since received a letter from them informing me that the school had increased from twenty to sixty scholars. Many of my schools have grown into nice churches. One was organized under a brush arbor, among some families who had not attended church in ten years. Gambling was the order of the day on Sunday. A great change for the better has already come to them. They now have a fine church house and a church membership of seventy-five. Across the mountain stands another beautiful little church which has grown from one of my arbor Sunday Schools.

visit the entire community, and in nearly every instance they wanted to see what the other fellow was going to do. I finally called a meeting and we met in the little sod schoolhouse. The house was crowded—every one wanted to SEE. They sat on the benches looking at each other; every one seemed ready for opposition.

I talked to them, however, the best I could, told them stories until they got to laughing. They laughed and they cried and seemed to

Robert G. Ingersoll

GOD has taken him. We are filled with tenderest sympathy for his household. As husband and father he had endeared himself unspeakably. The anguish is deep and relentless. We wonder not at the overpowering grief that was not able even to discuss the necessary arrangements for the obsequies. How cruel death is! Tears are wine to the King of Terrors. We pray for those broken hearts the comforting grace of God.

It is not the right time to enlarge upon the influence of the great agnostic's life. There are proprieties to be observed. There are feelings to be regarded. All the world knows that Colonel Ingersoll fought in brilliant and prolonged way against Christianity. But he has gone to judgment, and is in the hands of the God to whom we are all accountable. What ever others may write or do at such a solemn time as this, we certainly will plant no nettles on his new-made grave, and only wish that we could put upon it a fragrant and radiant garland of Christian hope and Divine solace.

Sympathy and Sadness

BE careful how you decide upon the destiny of Robert G. Ingersoll. Who can tell what passed in his mind during that last moment? Perhaps, in that moment, the truth of the Gospel, which he could not before see, may have flashed upon him, and it does not take an earnest prayer half a second to reach heaven, or the answer a half second to descend. His mother was a grandly good woman, and God remembers a supplication fifty years as easily as five minutes. Do not take too much responsibility upon yourself.

We never met the great sceptic, although he printed a book of four or five hundred pages, entitled Talmagean Theology, and made that the title of a lecture which he delivered in many of the cities. In those lectures and in that book he held us responsible for many of the crude and rough things said by other friends of Christianity for the last hundred and fifty years. But no irritation of feeling was caused, and we earnestly hoped that he would return to the religious faith in which his father and mother lived and died. But in this we have been disappointed, and the emotions dominant in us are sympathy and sadness.

His sudden going ought to make us all think. We had better get ourselves all right while life and health continue. When the sudden blast from the river Jordan strikes us, it will be a poor time to light our lanterns.

BRIEF NOTES

It is impossible to fill any more orders for coupon subscriptions. As we stated in our announcement the coupons by other classified bundle and order sent in June 15. Letters containing orders mailed after that date we are obliged to return to the senders.

The Red Letter New Testament will not be off the press before the end of August. As soon as the first edition is completed, copies will be promptly mailed to all persons entitled to them.

It is stated that 3,000 converts have been baptized by the Rev. R. H. Conwell, D.D., during his pastorate of the Temple Church, Philadelphia.

Since Dr. Barnardo's Homes were started in 1867 they have rescued, trained and passed out into life 30,000 boys and girls. Nearly 6,000 children are now in the Homes.

Owing to an unusual pressure on our columns, the publication of the "ROLL OF HONOR" is unavoidably postponed until next week.

The Rev. F. B. Meyer, B. A., has prepared for the Y. M. C. A. an extended series of Bible lessons designed for educated young men against Ritualism and Romanism.

A French commercial house in London has adopted a novel way of dealing with quarrels. He binds two men together by two and, giving one a broom, set the other a shovel, bids them clean the streets of his quarter.

Certain persons professing to be working for the conversion of the Jews have issued appeals for money to assist them in their work. Our readers would do well to write to this office for advice before responding to such appeals.

M. Paul de Cassagnac, one of the most prominent statesmen and writers in France, writing upon the decline of the French nation, says, "The cause of our decline is our renouncement of religion and want of respect for the past."

A church in Los Angeles occupied its new house of worship in 1887 but defeated the dedication of it because of the heavy debt upon it. The debt has now been cleared off and the dedication has taken place with great joy and a clear conscience.

Thirty-eight new members were received into membership at the recent communion in the Central Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn by the Rev. Dr. J. F. Carson, pastor, an aggregate of 185 new members received since the beginning of the year.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions is about to open a school and a medical dispensary in Manila. It has four missionaries, the Rev. J. B. Rogers and Mrs. Rogers and the Rev. David S. Hibbard and Mrs. Hibbard, at work there, and is holding preaching services.

The number of immigrants into this country during May and June is nearly double that of last year, and most of them come from the south of Europe. Last month 13,000 Italians and 5,000 Poles landed in New York, while the Germans numbered only 3,000 and Scandinavians 2,500.

A national convention of the Christian Endeavor societies of France, of which there are more than one hundred, has been called to meet in Paris at an early date to plan for work, and to discuss the form of welcome for the multitude of visitors coming from all the world to the International Exposition of next year.

A victim of the drink habit who has reformed, desires to have it made known that persons desiring emancipation from the curse of rum, will be helped by eating four oranges a day, beginning with one before breakfast and the others at intervals of three or four hours. He says that the practice was a great help to him.

Rev. J. Hal Smith, one of the Christian Alliance missionaries in the Soudan, reports a double bereavement. His sister Mrs. Shoebridge also a missionary in the Soudan, and his wife, formerly well known in the Alliance as Miss Bradshaw, have both succumbed to the climate, and though Mrs. Smith was promptly taken away, she died at Liverpool on her way home.

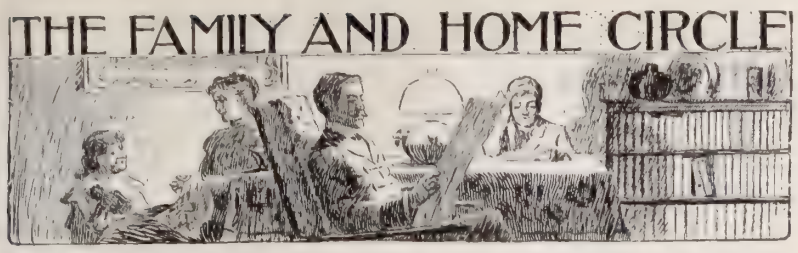
The extent to which the leading languages are respectively spoken is often discussed. A careful estimate, made by an eminent statistician, assigns to the Chinese language 400,000,000; to the English, 120,000,000; Russian, 100,000,000; Hindu, 90,000,000; German, 60,000,000; Spanish, 48,000,000; French, 46,000,000. At the beginning of this century the number of people speaking English was only 15,000,000.

An excellent work was done recently in Chicago by a gentleman and his wife, who took up their quarters for a few weeks in one of the poorest quarters of the city. When they found families living in houses clearly unhealthy, they helped them to move to better houses and then had the houses thus vacated condemned, much to the indignation of the owners, who had been deriving a large income from the rents.

Mr. D. L. Moody has written Lord Overtown declining the invitation signed by a large number of Christians urging him to visit Glasgow and other large cities in Scotland. Mr. Moody's reason is that the work here is more promising than ever. Mr. Moody says: "The coming year in America, I believe, is going to see a widespread evangelistic movement in which I trust that thousands may be reached by the churches.

A dictum of a work having high authority in the Roman Catholic Church, is quoted by the Congregationalist. It declares that the church "possesses a sovereign right to retard certain developments of science, if they should seem likely to become dangerous, in the higher interests of faith." The theory of Protestant churches is that the whole truth should be known if it is possible to discover it, but in Protestant churches the practice is not always in accord with that theory.

The Brotherhood of the Kingdom will hold its annual Conference at Marlborough-on-the-Hudson, July 31 to August 4. The managers say in their invitation: "All who love the Kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ are cordially invited to attend the Conference. We welcome especially those who long for a holier life, for greater unity among believers, for a more living knowledge of the Scriptures, and for more righteousness in social and political life. Marlborough is a station on the West Shore Railroad, eight miles from Newburgh, N. Y., and sixty-six miles from New York."



Fijian Homes

Christianity's Influence Over Savage Peoples —An Agnostic's Testimony

THE homes, industries and social customs of primitive folk usually appeal to the sympathies of civilized nations. Their thatched huts, crude implements, poor attempts at garments, ornaments of feathers, rags, beads and bits of metal, invest them in our eyes with something of the irresponsibility of childhood, and we long to give them better things and to teach them a better way. It has been Christianity's mission to improve the home and to elevate social life wherever its messengers have carried the Word of God. That worshipers of Mammon have preceded or followed them with strong drink and attendant evils, is often too true. But it will not always be so; prayer and labor have been too freely spent to establish Christ's kingdom for Mammon and rum to win the battle.

Now that we possess islands in the Pacific, it is a matter of particular interest to refresh our memories as to what Christian missionaries have accomplished for the homes of some brown-skinned folk of the eastern archipelagoes. It was Darwin who said: "The march of improvement consequent upon the introduction of Christianity throughout the South Seas, probably stands by itself in the records of history. Within twelve years human sacrifices, the power of an idolatrous priesthood, profligacy unparalleled in any other part of the world, infanticide and bloody wars, not sparing women and children, all these have been abolished, and dishonesty, intemperance and licentiousness have been greatly reduced." Fiji is a striking illustration of the truth of this statement. In 1835, the missionaries, Cross and Cargill, landed among cannibals, to whom every word of Darwin's description applies. The servants of God made peace between warring tribes, taught the children, reduced the language of the islanders to written and printed words, gave them the Scriptures, instructed the people in agricultural, pastoral and other arts, and showed them something about home-making and home-keeping. In ten years, cannibalism and other frightful customs were abjured; every village on the eighty inhabited islands had a tidy little church, and a good house for its teacher or native minister. A visitor wrote: "The schools are well attended. The first sound which greets your ear at dawn and the last at night, is that of hymn-singing and most fervent worship, rising from each dwelling at the hour of family worship."

The Fijian hut in our picture is typical of the dwelling that is passing away. In the volcanic regions, among the sharp pointed "needles" (hills), are others of a peculiar, sugar-loaf appearance; a village, seen from a distance, suggests a group of ant-hills. Most of the land is fertile: beautiful flowers and delicious fruits abound; streams are full of fish. The natives are fond of turtle-hunting: the flesh of the turtle supplies them with meat, and tortoise-shell is an article of export.

The homes of many Fijians are very tasteful. Some of them, of which the framework is timber and the rest lattice and thatch, are very picturesque. The natives show skill in carving, their pottery is good, and the mats, mosquito nets, baskets, fans and other furnishings are often distributed with pretty effect.

A Little Boy's Politeness

It was raining. An aged lady, who had crossed by ferry from Brooklyn to New York, looked wistfully across the street to the car she wanted to take. She had no umbrella: her arms were full of bundles. A shabby little fellow, carrying a cheap, but good umbrella, stepped up. "May I see you across, ma'am?" "Thank you, dear." Across the street, she handed him five cents. He declined it blushing, yet looking as if he wanted it. The lady was interested. She drew him under an awning and questioned him, to find that his having this umbrella at the ferry was a bit of childish enterprise to help his mamma. He had paid the seventy-five cents in his savings bank for it; and had already taken in thirty cents by renting his umbrella to gentlemen, who, like herself, had left their umbrellas at home. "You're the first old lady," he said with childhood's candor, that I've taken across—and—and I didn't think it was polite—I didn't think mamma would like me to charge you." "A child of the poor," thought his questioner, "but I know from his ways that his mother is a lady and a good woman."

"Lovely Lady"

A little girl, who was very plain, was grieving because less notice was bestowed on her than on her prettier playmates. "Oh, mamma!" she sobbed, with tears, "if I only were fair and had curls like Katie, people would love me like they do her." "Dear," said mamma, "some of the most attractive women I have ever known were homely. They had to depend upon pleasing ways and kind deeds for favor; and the hold of these over the heart that is won is more abiding than that of milk-white skin and golden curls. These women tried to be very neat and tasteful in their dress; they studied to do and to say interesting things. Now, if my little girl will profit by their example, and if she will, above all things, cultivate a sweet spirit, people will love her. Remember that prayer is a beautifier. Communion with God shows itself in the face and beautifies the plainest features. From this day forth be mamma's lovely lady, and see if you do not win and hold all the love you want."

A Marriage in Hebron

"Mashabe" or "Welcome" was her name. She was a Jewess, a sweet, simple girl, and very poor, so that the wedding was in a friend's house, says a correspondent of The Jerusalem News, who attended it:

We went into the heart of the busy "market," whence a small side door led to the Jewish quarter. Down a narrow passage we saw several paths, each between white washed walls, with irregular, steep, narrow stone steps, leading up or down. Our way lay up one flight of these. In a large, low room were a number of people assembled, chiefly women. The bride was dressed inexpensively in white, with "golden" yellow stripes, and veil with "gold" about it; a wreath of flowers, white shoes and gloves. Friends streamed in; we were packed as closely as possible. Then the bridegroom came and the rabbis. The customary services were gone through. Psalms and prayers were chanted in Hebrew. A silk scarf was held over the bride and bridegroom, forming a canopy; necessary signatures were written, and all the men, headed by the rabbis, adjourned to the neighboring synagogue. The festivities would probably continue for some days, and then the young bride would be kept in the seclusion of her husband's house, scarcely allowed to leave it for the first year after her marriage.

Truthfulness

Teach your child that truthfulness is the first essential of a moral life, and that it is the first essential of a truly successful life. A successful life based upon falsehood would be no success. In exchange for its mirage, one would have given a priceless possession. Say to your child: "To lose the truth would make you very poor. A lie is the very costliest thing on earth—it costs the whiteness and the cleanness of your soul. It costs you your Saviour himself, for Jesus said: 'I am the Truth.'"

A Most Motherly Hen

During a severe storm in December, says a Western journal, a kitten strayed into a yard at Lima, O., and would have perished with the cold had it not been promptly adopted by a big Cochin hen, who took the kitten under her wings and afterward denied herself of all food that the cat could eat. It was a queer sight on bright days to see the kitten sunning itself on the broad back of the old hen.

Heaven is Not Far Away

THE twilight sea,
That on the edge of [illegible]
Is farther distant than we are
From heaven [illegible]

The sainted saith,
That height nor depth, nor aught below, above,
Nor even all-engulfing death,
Can bring us from God's love.

For while we live [illegible] shade,
Is God our guide through all, both light and
And he the mastery doth give O'er all that he hath made.

And when we die—

That leads to immortality—

From midnight earth
Is but a step to morning paradise,
For from the instant of our birth
It shineth in our eyes

Our lives are his:
It matters not what means the Far or Near,
For where God is, there heaven is,
And God himself is here.

Little "Miss Misery"

SMALL Polly had somehow acquired the habit of always being in trouble. It came to be a sort of business with her to have the worst time of anybody. Uncle John, who had come on a visit to the family, made up his mind to pull Polly out of the "Slough of despond" into which she had fallen,—even if it had to be with something of a jerk. He had devised pleasures for her and Maggie, giving her the lion's share, so anxious was he to bring her to a happier disposition; but the happier disposition had not come. So he began adroitly to drop her out of plans for fun. "It will give our poor little Miss Misery a headache—or some sort of trouble—if we take her out on a tramp," he would say, with such tender considerateness that Polly's sense of being unfortunate was flattered for the moment. But she got tired very soon of being left at home when Maggie and uncle went out a-fishing or on an excursion to the woods, and, almost glad to have a new grievance, began to complain bitterly of neglect. But uncle would not appear to understand her or to take insinuations to himself, accepting all she said and did in his cheerful, sympathetic, caressing way. At last the little girl, climbing on his knee and into his arms, plead to be taken as before. "Why, my darling," said uncle, "I didn't see that you enjoyed anything I did to make you happy. You have so many troubles to take care of that you have no time for fun."

He gave her a kind little talk, and said: "You know, the Bible says: 'Whosoever hath not from him shall be taken even that he hath.' If you do not cultivate a happy nature, opportunities for pleasure cease to come your way. Remember, 'Whosever hath to him shall be given and he shall have more abundance.' Make yourself all the happiness you can."

"You won't call me 'Miss Misery' any more, will you, uncle?"

"Will you deserve the name if I call you Miss Happy Girl?"

"Oh, yes."

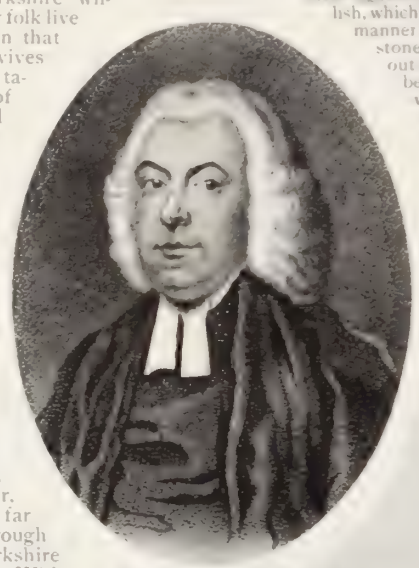
Fatherhood

"You speak to me," said a weather beaten man to a minister, "of God as my father. My father drank, he beat and cursed me. The word 'father' seems to mean something sweet and holy and protecting to you, but it means nothing of that kind to me." The minister was troubled. "How shall I help this man to know God?" he thought. He prayed for light and guidance and patience, and after long loving and striving he showed this man what spiritual fatherhood is, and led him to know what the trust and reverence are that should ever attach to the beautiful word "father," and so opened his eyes to the precious relationship man claims with God in the Lord's Prayer.

Around Grimshaw's Oak Table

The Venerable Relic at which Whitefield, the Wesleys, and other Famous Men Once Sat

THERE is an old parsonage at Haworth, Yorkshire, England, of peculiar interest to Methodists. It is built of stone, dug out of the hills, and stands to-day very much as it did one hundred and fifty years ago, on the edge of the great Yorkshire wilderness. Farmer folk live there now, and in that house there survives a long black oak table, carved, of great weight and strength, bearing the date 1688. William Grimshaw sat at that table, and many of the great leaders of the evangelist revival have sat there. John Wesley and his brother, Charles; Benjamin Ingham, one of the Oxford Methodists, whose societies, fifty in number, were scattered far and wide through that wild Yorkshire country; George Whitefield and many another zealous revivalist.



William Grimshaw was born at Brindle, Lancashire, Sept. 3, 1708, and in 1731 was ordained Deacon and became curate of Rochdale, but in the same year removed to Sodmorden, where he at first led a somewhat careless life. In 1734, he commenced to pass through a long spiritual struggle.

He became acquainted with the Wesleys, Whitefield, Romaine, Henry Venn and other revivalists, and many a meeting and conference of these took place at his parsonage around the noble old table, while some of them preached from the pulpit of Haworth Church. George Whitefield says that in 1756 he preached in honest Mr. Grimshaw's "Round" upon the mountains, to many thousands, and spoke at a watchnight at Leeds, with Grimshaw and Charles Wesley.

Wesley's first visit was on May 1, 1747. He then preached in the church to a "numerous congregation." When he went, ten years later, there were nearly a thousand communicants. On this and subsequent occasions he had to preach outside. A scaffold was erected on the south side of the church, near a window, through which Wesley could pass for the sermon, after prayer within.

Grimshaw's own influence in his parish was remarkable. He raised the number of communicants from twelve to 1,200, put a stop to the Haworth races, enforced the strictest observance of the Sabbath and persuaded the most reluctant to come to church. People came from long distances to hear him preach, and many requested him to come and preach where they resided, his itinerant labors taking him through Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire and North Derbyshire, and in various places he established societies presided over by leaders, much in the same way as John Wesley did. He died April 7, 1763, in his fifty-fifth year, of a fever contracted when visiting a sick parishioner. He was buried by his own desire by the side of his first wife in the chancel of Luddenden Church, near Haworth.

Missionaries Opposed by Spain

In a letter from Missionary T. M. MacKnight, dated at Las Palmas, Canary Islands, he tells of the difficulties encountered in connection with the project for a rest-house for sick and worn-out missionaries, whose health has given way under the strain of the deadly African climate. He writes:

"This is a very tonic atmosphere and not in [illegible] inches per annum, and, considering the latitude, 28° N., the temperature is very cool. During winter the mean temperature is 63°, the summer months it is 718. All this is in marked contrast to the heavy rainfall and great heat of the west coast. In this island (Canary) there is a strong feeling among the Spanish, which is shown in every possible manner, even to the throwing of stones at us by children when out walking. This feeling has been intensified since the war. Ships from Africa are often quarantined, and this summer entirely so, on the pretext of yellow fever on the coast, and no passengers may land. We believe it is known on the island that we are here for a Protestant cause, and this causes many small difficulties, which make it a very difficult place for us to settle in. The population of the island is 95,000.

A Song of Peace*

NOW the war-drum throbs no longer,
And the battle-flags are furled;
We exclaim in tones of rapture,
"We're at peace with all the world!"
Peace at least, in all our borders,
Peace in all our wide domain;
On the land and on the waters—
Peace at last with haughty Spain.

Homeward soon the son and brother,
Home the lover and the man.
Friends will gladly hail their coming—
Some, alas! will wait in vain.
Pitying angels hover o'er them,
Kiss away their falling tears,
Cheer the homes, so sad and lonely,
Cheer their hearts through coming years.

God of nations, we would praise thee!
Freedom's battle fought and won!
Broken every chain and fetter!
Free the father and the son!
May the isles so fair and fruitful,
Where the Stars and Stripes shall wave,
Be transformed, redeemed, uplifted—
Never calling man a slave.

Blessed peace! We hail its coming,
Bringing blessings in its train,
Blessings for the isles of ocean,
Blessings yet, we trust, for Spain.
May the Gospel's light and glory
Bid its sin and strife to cease,
'Till that land of ancient story
Welcomes in the Prince of Prince.

DUKE CARL THEODOR of Bavaria and his Duchess lately celebrated their silver wedding. There was no grand display in a cathedral, no solemn music and throng of gorgeously dressed men and women, but it was a true and [illegible] people's fete, and was greatly enjoyed. The Duke was born at Passenhofen, on Lake Starenberg, in 1839. He is the second son of Duke Max and his wife, the latter a sister of the king of Bavaria.

DUKE CARL THEODOR

He never felt any inclination to follow in the footsteps of his royal predecessors by entering the army or navy. Rather than choose a profession in which it might be his duty to inflict injury or death, the Duke devoted his life and energies to healing the sick and relieving the afflicted. He became an oculist, and is widely known as a skillful and successful practitioner. He devotes his efforts to the poorest class of patients, who are not able to pay the high fees demanded by oculists. His practice is very extensive, and he has lately performed his one-thousandth operation for cataract. Thousands of poor to-day thank him for the preservation of their sight. Among his special patients was the Emperor of Germany, who [illegible] year ago to treat his injured eye.

Duke Carl Theodor has converted his beautiful Castle of Tegernsee into an eye-hospital. He is assisted in many cases by the Duchess, whose soothing power in delicate operations is invaluable.

The Broadway Tent Revival

At the revival meetings in the Gospel tent "Glad Tidings," on Broadway and Fifty-sixth street, New York, large crowds still continue to attend the regular services week days and Sunday afternoons. Ira D. Sankey, the well-known singer, led the musical part of the service on Sunday afternoon, July 23. Among the pastors who spoke at recent meetings were: Rev. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Rev. Dr. H. M. Wharton, Rev. Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, Rev. John H. Elliott, Rev. Dr. C. E. Jefferson, Rev. Dr. W. M. Smith, Rev. Dr. A. C. Dixon, Rev. Dr. David Gregg, Rev. Dr. A. J. Behrends, Rev. Dr. George T. Lorimer, Rev Dr. P. S. Henson, Rev. F. B. Meyer, Rev. Campbell Morgan and Rev. Sidney Selden. Rev. Francis E. Clarke, of the Christian Endeavor Society, spoke at the Sunday afternoon rally. A number of additional conversions are reported.

A Timely Word About Christian Science—Women and Smuggling—A Fashionable Evil

WE had all attended the funeral. "I like a funeral on Sunday afternoon," said good Deacon Plumtree, "people have time to go to it then without neglecting their duties."

"Yes," said Emily Fletcher, "and one meets so many of one's friends there, it is really, well, not cheerful exactly, but sociable and pleasant. I saw the Posts, and the Martins from the Hollow, and cousin Letty's folks from across the mountain, at Mrs. Noble's funeral today."

"The minister does not like funerals on Sunday," said the minister's niece. He says they interrupt the regular order of services, distract the peoples' minds, and add a great deal to his work on the busiest day in the week."

This remark was not taken up by anybody, and fell rather flatly to the ground, but Miss Prissy did not care. She was from town, and had the ease and air expected from a woman brought up in a large and stirring community, where there is always a lot going on socially, and besides, Miss Prissy being a college graduate, and engaged to an officer in the Philippines, has the courage of her convictions. It was no secret to those of us who had ever thought on the matter, that the minister objected to funerals on the Sabbath, but we also knew that on such occasions the minister's convenience is very seldom consulted. Is he not the servant of the people, and bound to do their bidding? That is the unspoken opinion of mourners, at least, and usually of their friends, too.

Mrs. Deacon Ladd, looking half afraid of her audience, yet summing up her resolution, observed:

"Anne Noble might have been alive and sittin' here with the rest of us, if she'd called the doctor in sooner."

"I don't see how you can say such a thing, Betty Ladd," exclaimed Mrs. William James Russell, fiercely. Mrs. Russell is a large woman of fine presence; she is President of the Woman's Club, and of the Ladies' Aid. Her cards are engraved as above, and her full name is always printed on programmes. Latterly, Mrs. William James Russell has been visiting Boston, and has given her assent to the theories of the Christian Scientists. Mrs. Noble, the friend who was just deceased, was a Christian Scientist also, and during an illness extending over six months, she had not received the attention of any physician, and had made her husband, an uncertain sort of man who never dared oppose her will, most wretchedly unhappy because she was failing before his eyes, yet always declaring herself "perfectly well, yes, very well and happy."

"If Tom Noble had had a mite of backbone his wife would have had Dr. Embree in the first place, and been around in no time." This was said firmly by one of the selectmen, a Mr. Smith. People didn't like him very much because of his dogmatic manner of speech, and because he was a truculent personage, bent on setting the world right. Not that he cared about Christian Science, but because he wished to annoy Mr. Smith, young Harry Raymond blurted out:

"Doctors kill as many as they cure. Their fussing and coddling do no good, and they are always experimenting. Why, down Cossett Way, a man died the other day after an operation for appendicitis. It turned out he didn't have appendicitis, and didn't need an operation, but by the time they found that out the poor fellow was dead as a door-nail."

Mr. Smith glared at Harry. "Your story has no manner of relation to the subject we are discussing," he said sternly. "My point was that a husband, seeing his wife's health in danger, ought to overrule her, and get her medical aid willy nilly."

"As to that," said little Amy Burcell, "some women would rather die comfortably and have their own way, than be forced to do what is good for them and give up their own way. Women are made so. Besides, as Mr. Smith is a bachelor, he cannot judge for Tom Noble, who probably did the best he could. Anne Noble was a happy woman while she lived; anybody could see that."

"Christian Science," our good Dr. Eliot now spoke, and we listened attentively, "as now promulgated unblushingly by its founders and followers, is a great money-making scheme, full of humbug, and imposing on the credulous. Certainly a sweet and child like dependence upon God, an absolute acceptance of Christ's words and Christ's will, must do good to any one. Many maladies get well of themselves, if left to nature, and if the mind is calm and composed. Fresh air is itself a wonderful healer; witness the fact that there have been 1,000 fewer deaths from consumption in New York City, with its swarming population, this last year, than were thirteen years ago, when the tenement house conditions were infinitely worse than now. They are still bad enough, heaven knows, but they are better than they were, and people do not die quite so fast of consumption. I have observed that people who adopt Christian Science as their belief cut loose from their moorings, soon lose vital religion, and drift into neglect of its obligations. Medical healing is of God, and is scientific, too; is as really scientific and as really Christian as any healing can be, and when there is diphtheria, or scarlet fever, or typhoid to fight with; when Mamie breaks her collar-bone and Jim his leg, and Benny drives a rusty nail into his foot, use faith and common sense and send for the doctor."

This was the talk we had the other night after our neighbor's funeral. I listened, and said nothing, but my eyes were wet, for I thought of Tom Noble, so clumsy and helpless without a wife; and of Leila and Teddy with no mother, and sure to have a stepmother by and by, who maybe wouldn't be kind to them; and of Anne in her grave under the roses, dying, heaps of them, on it, beneath the moon, and my heart ached.

WHY DO women love to smuggle? In other words, why do women, not thieves, nor shoplifters, nor story-tellers, as a rule, love to cheat their Government, and boast of the lace and the jewels, and the gloves, which they have brought in, scot-free, past the jealous eyes of the custom-house inspectors? We all know how proudly they display table linen they did not "declare," the silver and trinkets and gauds they managed to get safely home without paying a tax upon. We are all paying taxes now, and very willingly, for the support of our government and the strength of its armies at home and abroad, and it is humiliating to find rich women trying to despoil the country of its dues in this bare-faced and foolish way.

Most of the beautiful articles wealthy women buy abroad at what seems to them a reduced rate, they could buy over here in New York, or Chicago, or San Francisco, at the minimum of trouble and fuss. The merchant would have paid the duty, and they would never think of it. It may be the innate love of a bargain; it may be the difficulty a woman has in understanding the ins and outs of the tariff; it may be the finesse which is a part of a woman's nature, but women would never delight in smuggling if they called it by the ugly name of theft. Convince them the two are synonymous and women will smuggle no more.

TOO OLD to begin learning a new language? How old are you, my friend? I would not think fifty, or sixty, or seventy too old, granting the person had patience, perseverance and eyesight to undertake any new labor or pursuit. Nobody can lay us on the shelf if we keep alert and alive, and use the faculties we have. More people rust out than wear out in this world.

Trust in the Lord

Trust him for a way when there is no way; for light when there is no light; for all things when you have nothing: for joy when there is only sorrow: for life when you are in the midst of death.
J. MUNGER.

When wearied oft with efforts vain
Through many a dreary, lengthened day;
When every Door of Hope seems closed,
Still trust the Lord to make a way.
When in thick darkness deep you walk
Through lonely path in starless night,
Still trust the Lord to bring the dawn—
The shining clear of morning light.

Trust him for all things when bereft,
Forsaken, friendless, poor and lone,
Shipwrecked amid the storms of earth,
With nothing you can call your own.
Trust him for joy when only grief
And sorrow fill the present hour;
Trust him to soothe and strengthen still,
Upheld by his Almighty power.

Trust him for life when in the midst
Of the Death Valley, dark and lone;
He leadeth still; his love is sure;
Through all he safely keeps his own.
Then you will find at last that faith
Is not alone all righteousness;
But it is life and joy and peace,
Always the trusting soul to bless.

A Letter from the Dead!

THERE was an air of strange stillness about the old farmhouse. The door swung wide open, but the wayfarer in the road could catch a glimpse of white ribbons and a bunch of flowers hanging on the knob—an unusual demonstration at Mills X Roads, as the little hamlet was called. While the wayfarer watered his horse at the public trough just outside the gate, he beckoned to him one of a group of men who were sitting in the yard under the shade of a tree.

"What's the matter?" he asked with that right of interest which country people have in each other's affairs.

"Old lady Mills died Wednesday—very sudden—at sunset."

"I'm powerful sorry to hear it. I had it in my mind somebody was dead when I see so many folks aroun' an' everything so quiet-like, but them flowers looked so gaily—an' them ribbins——"

"Her cousin's darter—the little gal from town—put 'em thar. She wanted black, but she didn't have none. I ain't thinkin' its a good way myself, but it pleasured the little gal."

"Ain't you keepin' her out mighty long?"

"We're waitin' for Billy."

"A-ah!"

Josiah Edmunds, a friend of the Mills family, who was acting as master of ceremonies, approached the party, and invited the wayfarer to "pay his respecks."

"I haint sent any notices over to your county," he said apologetically, "an' thet's how you ain't been notified. You see, we didn't know what time to set for the funeral, bein' how ez we're waitin' for Billy."

"When's he comin'?"

"We don't know," gloomily. "An' we don't know ez he's comin' at all. We sent a dispatch soon ez she was took, but we ain't had no word. He might not ha' been home, an' then he mightn't answer no way. After what's happened, thar ain't no knowin' what Billy might or mightn't do. Though, for all I know of him, I'd think as a business man thet knows what's got to be done with a corpse an' how serus our position is, he'd send a answer. The las' word she says was: 'Don't bury me till Billy comes.' I dispatched him thet, too. Them telegrams cost me nigh five dollars."

"Billy's a powerful strange man."

"The self-willedest man thet ever was! I never see nothin' like him!"

The horse had finished drinking and was tethered to the rack in company with a number of his kind. Many friends had come to "pay respecks" to Mrs. Mills. Vehicles, whose teams had been unhitched, and vehicles with teams "minded" by small boys or tied to trees stood about on the side of the road and in the edge of the grove across it. Clusters of men, conversing in low tones, sat under each big tree in the old-fashioned yard. In shady corners of the rose-covered porch, groups of women, some with needlework, some with knitting in their hands, chatted softly. They looked up quickly when Josiah and the newcomer stepped on to the porch, and the men understood the disappointment in their faces.

"I thought 'twas Billy," sighed Mrs. Anderson, dropping back in the chair from which she had half-risen.

"I hoped 'twas," said Mrs. Jones.

"I have about stopped looking for Billy," Polly Hooker, a friend of Billy's wife, observed. "A man that could treat his wife and children as Billy Mills has treated his, can't be expected to do the decent thing by a dead mother."

"Now, now, Polly, Ailsa Mills wouldn't like you to talk that way—you know she wouldn't. She's never said a word agin' him herself," put in poor old Sarah Robinson, whose eyes were red with weeping for the woman who had been her chum at school sixty years ago.

"And that's why I feel the more like saying it."

"Well, my dear, don't. Billy might hear of it sometime, an' he's thet sensitive an' contentious, he might think Ailsa put you up to it, an' the breach thet we've all prayed might be healed would be widened. I've got faith to believe thet it will be healed. I've got faith to believe thet he will come before we put his mother in the ground. An' she'll speak to him!—dead though she be—an' he'll hear!"

"I wish I had your faith, Granny. I wish I had your faith. But a man that could go away from his wife, mother and children, and stay away for five solid years—and for no cause at all—I can't expect anything good of him.

"He thought he had cause, Polly, he thought he had cause. It was in his blood and his bones to think he ought to be master, an' nobody to ask any questions. Everybody ain't made alike, child. Billy's to be pitied an' prayed for."

"I don't see at all where the pity comes in. He's in town, making money hand over fist, having a good time driving around in the park; and gloating in his heart, I'll be bound over the way he knows his wife and mother miss and grieve after him."

"She ain't grievin' now, child, she ain't grievin' now. She's 'forever with the Lord.' An' I don't believe Billy's havin' any good time or enjoyin' himself any. 'Tain't natchel thet he should. No man can't treat his own flesh an' blood thet way an' have a good time. Don't you believe it! Mo'n that, the little girl says her Cousin Bill don't go nowhere, nor have anything to do with anybody 'less it concerns his work—that he jes' works an' works an' works, ez if thar warn't nothin' to live for but work. An' ain't he always sent money—an a plenty of it—back here?"

"Man cannot live by bread alone!" quoted Polly. "A man promises something more when he takes a wife than just to give her food and clothes. He has no more right to take his love from her than he has to rob a bank."

"I don't believe but Billy loves Ailsa. His will is stronger than his heart is warm, thet's all. But the Lord changeth the heart. I tell you, child, she thet's gone and I thet's left have prayed half the night over this thing, right in that room where she's lyin' so still—with thet letter for Billy in her hand. An' I tell you the Lord is faithful."

"May I ask," said Mrs. Turner, the new minister's bride, who had just come to the X Roads the day before, "what was the occasion of Mr. Mills' going away? I don't want to be obtrusive, but you are all my husband's people, and I don't want to be ignorant where I ought to be informed."

"Bless you, child, no!" said Granny, as everybody called old Sarah, "an' you should ha' been told—only it's been common talk so long that we take it everybody knows—what is to be known. You tell 'er, Polly, you're the learnedst of us."

"No," said Polly, "I have absolutely no patience with him. I should speak with severe justice, and that might, as you say, bring poor Ailsa more trouble, and God knows, she's had enough."

"Well, my dear," said Granny to the minister's bride, "this is the way of it to the best of our understanding—though it's a hard thing to understand, and you can't be expected to understand it, not knowin' Billy. Billy, from a little boy, had his own way about everything. It warn't his ma's fault; she done her best. But his pa was thet way befo' him; he had had his way about everything. Joyce Mills had give way befo' her husband till she was in the habit of givin' away an' it was hard for her to keep up against anybody. John Mills was a good man to her: she wanted to live in peace; he didn't ask hard things of her; she thought it was her duty—and may be it was. But, anyhow, she got in the way of givin' way to him about everything, an' she kept it up more or less with Billy. An' it warn't good for Billy. Befo' thet boy was twenty, he ruled this house with a rod of iron. If anybody said him nay, he sulked and made things so uncomfortable thet his mother didn't say him nay often. An', of course, nobody else did. Then he got married. An' Ailsa, not knowin' any different, went ahead doin' her own way just as she had been used to. An' Billy, bein' new married, thought it was the cutest thing in the world, an' didn't mind. When he'd laid down the law to his mother, Ailsa would laugh an' say, 'I'll spank Billy, mother!' But, after a while, it worried her when she see the way he set his own will against his mother's in everything an' had his own way over her; an' it worried her because she see thet she was beginnin' to give way jes' like his ma an' he was beginnin' to treat her the same way. An' then the babies come, an' she see she couldn't have no voice as a mother ought to have in raisin' 'em, an' her little John was walkin' right in his footsteps An' it all wore on her, an' may be she got a little cross herself——"

"Who wouldn't?" broke in Polly.

"Nobody," answered Granny, quietly; and proceeded, "an' it was all the harder for her to stand up against Billy, when she knew he was wrong, because she loved him so much and because he loved her and was good to her mostly an' didn' see his own fault. Joyce, seeing where she had failed, stood by her, and would strengthen her an' say, 'Obey your husband in the Lord, child,' only 'in the Lord,' that's the apostle's command.' Well, Ailsa and Billy had a quarrel. Nobody's ever known just what it was about, but whatever it was, Ailsa stood her ground. Billy was a worldly man; after the bridegroom days he wouldn't go with his wife to church. One Sunday, when Ailsa had little John ready for Sunday School, he came in and carried the boy off fishing—laughin' an' sayin' he didn' want the boy to be no preacher or milksop. He done it so good humored an' so quick that Ailsa didn't remember till after he was gone thet she hadn't thought to stand up strong against it. Then he carried the boy off to the store down at the Corners, an' he come back laughin' at how one of his friends had give the boy a glass of beer an' how the boy had behaved after it. Then Ailsa was all worked up an' said some terrible things—that was all the harder for her, havin' kept 'em back so long. She told him, for one, that she shouldn't let her boy go with him any more; that if ever he carried little John off again, it would be over her dead body. In the face of that, he carried little John off again the very next Sunday, and kept him off all day and all night, an' when he came back, he told her that John had stood his second glass of beer better. She didn't say any short words to him thet time, but she had a little straight talk with him thet ended by his walking out of thet front door and never walking in it from thet day to this. She and his mother thought he'd come back, but he never did. They wrote letters and begged him to come home, but he didn't give any answer. Then Joyce says, 'We won't ask him no more, Ailsa. When he gets ready he'll come, and not before.' Ailsa's said, many a time, 'Ma, let me go away, an' he'll come back to you?' But Joyce 'd say, 'No. It wouldn' be right.' Three years ago he begun to sen' money home, but he's never writ. When she was took last Wednesday, she sent him word, an' we telegraphed it just like she said it, 'Billy, yore mammy is dyin.' Josiah Edmunds had got off a long dispatch an' started Susannah's Ike off with it to the

That Common Trouble, Acid Dyspepsia, or Sour Stomach.

Now Recognized as a Case of Serious Disease.

Acid dyspepsia, commonly called heartburn or sour stomach, is a form of indigestion resulting from fermentation of the food. The stomach being too weak to promptly digest the food remains and ferments, gas forms, filling the stomach with gas, and a bitter, sour, burning taste in the mouth is often present. This condition soon becomes chronic, and by its constant daily annoyance it grows beyond attention. Because dyspepsia is not immediately fatal, many people die suffering for the trouble.

Within a recent period a remedy has been discovered, prepared ready to cure dyspepsia and stomach troubles. It is known as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and is now becoming rapidly used and prescribed as a radical cure for all forms of dyspepsia.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets have been placed before the public and are now sold by druggists everywhere at 50 cents per package. It is prepared by the F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich., and while it promptly and effectually restores a vigorous digestion, at the same time is perfectly harmless and will not injure the most delicate stomach, but on the contrary, by giving perfect digestion strengthens the stomach, improves the appetite and makes life worth living.

station, but we sent Joyce's message jes' the same. My Bob took it. An' I'm thinkin' Billy'll sho be 'long after awhile."

The minister's wife noticed her husband and a little group of men file quietly into the house. Others followed them; and looking through the rosebush, she noticed that there were only a few neighbors left in the yard, and that these were walking slowly towards the porch. Josiah Edmunds came out of the house and spoke to the women:

"It's three days an' we aint heard from Billy. We've got to put 'er away."

"Can't ye wait a leetle—jes a leetle longer, Joe?" pleaded Sarah.

"No use, Granny. He's had time to get here—much more sen' word. The doctor says the strain 'll kill Ailsa—an' thet we mus' do it enyhow. Come in the house, ladies, an' he'p Ailsa bear up, an' let's all submit to the will of the Lord."

As Sarah went in, walking feebly and leaning on the arm of the minister's wife, her lips were moving in silent prayer. As they entered, they heard a choaking voice plead:

"Don't put her in the coffin yet, Joe; wait a little. Wait a little, please Joe."

The neighbors ranged themselves around the room, the minister's wife and Ailsa and her children at the head of the bier upon which Mother Mills was lying as in a sweet sleep. In Mother Mill's hand was a letter addressed to her son in her own writing. On the little table which held the Bible for the minister were pen, ink and paper that Ailsa had put there. The minister's wife whispered to him, and then began to sing:

Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wakes to weep.

They were all singing and they did not hear hurrying feet come up the porch. A man stood in the doorway—a tall, broad shouldered man with a firm-set jaw that they all knew. He looked neither to the right nor to the left. He walked straight to the bier. There he stood, looking down at the dead woman, his strong jaw working.

Five years ago when he went away, she had been a portly, robust woman. The figure on the bier looked very long and slender. The gentle, peaceful face was very thin. It told him of vigils and yearnings and prayer.

"Mother! mother!" he cried.

"Read the letter, Bill," said Josiah. "She said you was to read it!"

With his eyes fixed on her face, he had not noticed it. He took it out of the dead hand and read it. Her vision had been darkening, her hand had been unsteady, but he could make it out. It said:

"Billy, your mammy is dead. Meet me in heaven. Comfort Ailsa. Don't leave her no more. Help her to raise the children right. Billy, my boy, answer mammy. Put an answer in my hand an' let me be buried with it. I'll know it somehow. Goodbye, Billy, my boy. God bless you. Your Mammy."

He walked to the table and wrote an answer and put it in his mother's hand.

"Where's Ailsa?" he asked.

A little, pale woman in black, who had shrunk behind the minister's wife, came forward, and looked up in his face. He put his arm about her.

"I've promised, Ailsa. And I've asked her to forgive me. Can you?"

They knelt sobbing beside the dead woman, and the voice of the minister arose:

"'I am the Resurrection and the Life. He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live.'"

Madura's Mission Hospital

Frank VanAllen, a medical missionary in India, writes:

The new mission hospital in Madura, India, is now complete. The whole sum for its construction was raised in India, and almost all of it was given by non-Christian Hindus, showing not only their confidence in the missionaries, but their willingness to assist a Christian work when their hearts have been won by Christian philanthrophy and love. That so large a sum ($14,000) should be given by those of Hindu faith for the erection of a distinctively Christian hospital is significant.

The total number of patients treated last year was 14,700. The sick came from the town of Madura and the outlying districts some from a distance of from ten to thirty miles, and sometimes even sixty miles. Since we have been occupying the new hospital the daily attendance of out-patients as well as the number of in patients has increased. The Bible is faithfully taught daily to those who come to the hospital

A Service of Promise

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Aug. 13 John 14: 1-14

TROUBLED hearts in every generation since Christ came, have turned to these words, spoken in the last sad hours of his life, and have found relief. They contain the essence of Christianity. They show us what the religion of Christ really is. We are to learn from them that Christianity is not so much a system of doctrines, nor a creed, nor a form of worship, as a living union with a living Lord. Christ presents this truth in many ways, under many figures, all chosen to show how close and vital this union is. Their sublime pathos appears when we consider the circumstances in which they were uttered. The men surrounding Jesus were full of sorrow, because he had warned them of his approaching separation from them. He knew that the events then close at hand would try them more than they then could conceive. They had deceived themselves. They had been looking for a kingdom, for glories and honors and high station. They had seen his power, they knew that all things were possible to him and had built their hopes on his coming exaltation. They were to see him arrested, scourged, spit upon and executed as a common felon. Foreseeing their perplexity, their disappointment, their consternation, what could he say that would comfort them when they would have such bitter need of comfort? This is the note that he sounds, now in one way, now in another, that he will always be with them in the future and to all who live his life in after generations, strengthening them and sustaining them in all trial and in all joy.

When we come to realize what this promise was, we see that it includes everything that the Christian most desires. With this promise of Christ's continuous abiding presence, he has no need to fear, no cause for apprehension, no excuse for foreboding. It comprises everything that is needed for every condition. The missionary in a far-off land, separated from home and friends and surrounded by savages, knows, as he appropriates this promise, that he is not alone. The solitary Christian, separated by his faith from his own family or in the factory from his fellow-workmen, disliked, despised, ridiculed, clasps this promise to his heart and gains new courage. Christ is with him, why should he fear? Even when he enters the dark valley of the shadow of death he fears no evil, for Christ will not leave him even there. It is the closest of all friendships, the nearest of all ties. "Believe in me" is the word that is to bring strength and comfort and joy. Not believe in what I have taught, nor in anything about me, but believe in me personally, not as one dead, nor as one glorified and raised far above earth's toils and troubles, but believe in me as one ever near, abiding with you. They are the words of a friend, who has omnipotent power and whose love is infinite. Believing in his presence, there is no path too rugged, no obstacle too great, no experience too bitter for us to meet. Being present, he will see our daily need and will supply it. The grace appropriate to circumstances as they arise will be understood better than we can understand it and will be imparted. In his presence, united with him, all is assured.

What a purifying influence, too, comes from this promise. If he is with us, how can we enter into places of doubtful character, or join in amusements that degrade us? Must we leave his company to go into society where he would not go? Can we do anything that would grieve him? "Believe in me," then we must adopt the principles of his life. The works that he did we must do. Greater works, indeed, he promises shall we do under the stimulus of his presence; for then he was only founding his kingdom and men were not able to understand him. But now when his power and the beauty of his character are recognized, how much more can be done on the lines of his work! Identifying ourselves with him, calling ourselves by his name, we may go forward in his strength to do his work. There are people who know him not, whom we may enlighten, people in trouble whom we may comfort, people in bondage to evil habit whom we may liberate, people living the lives of animals whom we may induce to rise to the privileges of the sons of God. That is what he came here to do. His work was cut short in its infancy, but we may carry it forward. He is here with us to rejoice in its being done. The inspiration that comes from the realization of his abiding presence transforms all the life; it purifies, it ennobles, it stimulates, it strengthens, so that in the end, reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, we are transformed into the same image.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

J. R. N., Zanesville, O. A few friends here have decided to refer to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for decision the question whether a Christian church is justified in accepting a gift of money from a saloon-keeper, to be used in connection with its missionary and other spiritual work? We are divided on the subject, and would be greatly pleased if you could enlighten us as to our best course: whether we ought to accept the money unhesitatingly, and never questioning the source from which it comes, or reject it as money that is tainted and an offence to God, who requires that our offerings should be without spot or blemish. We have no desire to do injustice to anyone, hence our appeal to you.

As this question is one of universal interest to all connected with the church or with God's work in any form, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would be pleased to hear from its readers on the subject, and therefore, it invites all to send us briefly, by mail, an expression of opinion on the question in J. R. N.'s letter, stating what they think to be the proper course for a church to pursue under the circumstances.

Reader, Pondeddy, N. Y. 1. Is it proper for the scholars in a Sabbath School to have a voice in electing the officers? 2. Is it right to elect officers and do the business of the school on Sunday?

1. Only in case the by-laws say so. The usual way is for the teachers only to have a voice in the election. 2. The business meetings of a Sunday School should be held during the week, but not on prayer-meeting nights, unless the members live so far from the church as to make attendance burdensome. It is better, however, to hold the business meetings on prayer-meeting nights than not at all.

Gold Pen, Mich. 1. Do you believe preaching from manuscript proves or disproves that one is called to the work? 2. Associated Press articles recently proclaimed the discovery of the real Garden of Eden. What do you know about it?

1. It proves nothing either way. A man may be eloquent and effective with preparation, and yet a wretched extemporaneous speaker. 2. Alleged discoveries of the kind have been going on for centuries. It is variously claimed to have been found in Mesopotamia, Armenia and Ceylon, and now the latest discovery to which you refer (and which was mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD several weeks ago) is in East Africa, near Somaliland. A traveler has found there a region which meets all the geographical and other requirements mentioned in the Biblical description. It is about as reliable as any of the other "discoveries"—no more and no less. As to the other question in your letter, write to the Congressman from your district for all information.

S. S. Teacher, New York. My class will send prepaid a box of shoes and hats which their owners have outgrown, but which are in good condition for your Fresh-Air children. You have made no mention of such a need and we do not know if they would be acceptable.

They will be very timely indeed. Sizes should be for children from five to twelve years old, and the box should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, New York.

R. S., Oyster Bay, N. Y. The accounts of the Peace Conference in the daily press we find somewhat confusing. What is the net outcome of the Conference, thus far?

The net result is a triumph for the principles of international arbitration, the Committee to which the proposals were referred having adopted the arbitration plan as a whole. The official despatches announce that, even with the modifications made, the adoption of the scheme must be regarded as a distinct triumph for the peace interest.

J. B. M., Waterloo, Ont. 1. What is the meaning of the description of the New Jerusalem in Rev. 20: 1-5? 2. What is the original significance of the word. Hades? 3. What is the condition Paul describes in Rom. 7: 19-22?

1. John describes what he saw in a vision. He does not make it very clear but it was doubtless difficult to do so. He seems to have had the idea of a heavenly city lowered to the earth from the skies. 2. Originally it was the invisible, but in the time in which the Bible was translated into Greek it was used to signify the abode of the departed. 3. Paul was describing the miserable condition of a man trying in his own strength to lead a good life. His triumphant "eureka" at the end of the chapter is explained in the next chapter, in which he shows how that which was before impossible became possible when Christ's power was given to him.

We are still receiving copies of "The Philosopher's Scales" in reply to the request of R. S. Bosworth in a recent issue. Copies have been received from Mrs. E. G. Tunnierman, Hampton, Ia., Mrs. H. J. Robertson, Grass Valley, Calif., Mary Hines, Turkey, N. C., and a number of other readers in different States.

G. N. S., Bainbridge, Ga. What positions or offices [illegible] prefix "Hon."? I presume there is some limit to which this prefix reaches, and there should be a standard or code that should govern. The use is becoming so common that it loses dignity.

It is proper to use the prefix in addressing the leading officials in the national government, including Cabinet, Supreme Court, and Congress; the chiefs of important bureaus. Ambassadors and Ministers, also Governors of States. The custom has gradually been extended by common consent to include State Legislators and sitting judges in the various branches of the judiciary. To dub every petty local official "honorable" is absurd.

Mary C. C., Mystic, Conn. Please give the location of the Kingdom of Geshur, the place where Absalom took refuge after the murder of Amnon. After reading the learned Dr. Adam Clark on the subject, and not feeling satisfied. I would like your opinion.

It was the name of a district of Syria, near Gilead, and lay between Hermon, Maachah and Bashan (see Deut. 3: 13, 14, and Josh., 12: 5). It is supposed to be the region now known as the Lejah, and is full of wild and rugged scenery.

Mrs. Lucy P. C., Dallas, Tex. When were postage stamps first introduced in the United States?

In 1847.

J. S. N., New York City. Please explain the meaning of the last part of the 4th verse of the 146th Psalm. "In that very day his thoughts perish."

The Psalmist is speaking purely in a human sense of human thoughts and projects and the things that relate to this world. A paraphrase [illegible] jects, schemes and plans—the thoughts of his brain relating to schemes of worldly power and policy, perish." See the concordant passage, I. Cor. 2: 6, which refers to the "wisdom of this world nor of the princes of this world that come to nought," as distinguished from the Divine wisdom (spoken of in the next verse) which endures forever.

Here is an excellent suggestion, in a letter from a CHRISTIAN HERALD reader, which others may be able to profit by. The writer is Mrs. E. H. G., Old Mystic, Conn.:

[illegible] more pleasure than a subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year. In every case it has been greatly appreciated. It seems very little for us to do for the paper which has done so much for us. Let us be up and doing and not be too easily discouraged; solicit all we can and give all we can, [illegible] fore this century may close to secure the million [illegible] grandest anniversary present it could possibly have. Remember that, while we are working for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we are working for God and humanity.

[illegible] interesting places to visit in New York City for a party expecting to spend two days there? 2. If the Czar of Russia is a Christian and a believer in peace, why did he allow the Doukhobors or Russian Quakers to be persecuted because they refused to perform military service?

1. City Hall, Central Park, the Zoo, Navy Yard, Governor's Island, Liberty Statue, the East River Bridge, Grant's Tomb, Prospect Park and Coney Island. If time is too brief, [illegible] will tell of it." The burden seemed to be [illegible] Germany and China? Was a flower decided on [illegible] able to supply. We will be glad if our readers can make additions to it. England, rose; Ireland, shamrock; Scotland, thistle; France, [illegible] Prussia the linden; Saxony, mignonette; Spain, pomegranate; India, lotus-leaf; Canada, we believe, takes the sugar maple; and the United States will probably settle upon the columbine, although other flowers have [illegible] days than Sunday? Is there not really more [illegible]

You are quite right about the work of preparing a Sunday newspaper being done on week-days, and the work of preparing the Monday newspaper being done on Sunday. It is clear, however, that the world would not be content to do without the Monday newspaper. Still, if there were only six issues of the daily in a week, as there are in England, the staff of a daily journal would get one day in the week free. Probably from 4 A. M. on Saturday to 9 A. M. on Sunday. Turning from the question of responsibility for Sabbath-breaking in production, we come to the effect on the reader. The reading of the Sunday newspaper is an intrusion of secular affairs on a day reserved for the spiritual, and in this it is injurious. Probably many stay away from church in order to read the voluminous sheets of the Sunday issue. The course you suggest, of reading it on the Monday, avoids that difficulty, but we cannot well imagine an American citizen, who likes to know as speedily as possible everything that has occurred, keeping his paper unopened for twenty-four hours. Few people have that amount of self-control. The only effectual means of getting rid of the evil is probably so extensive a change in public opinion as would have an influence with the publishers. No men are so sensitive as they to public opinion. If the majority of their readers refused to buy the Sunday issue, it would soon cease to be printed. The change next in order of desirability would be a reform in the paper itself. If it is to be issued, it ought, in deference to the day, to drop its objectionable features and give prominence to religious features and print the news of the progress of Christ's Kingdom.

Miss Laura Ashburn, New Richmond, O., writes that back numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, tracts or other good literature, will be very acceptable to a struggling mission Sunday School in that town and will be promptly distributed by her.

Troubled One. It is, of course, easy to decide a case when only one side is stated. If, however, there is nothing valid to be alleged on the other side and the facts are as you state them, we should say that you are perfectly justified in doing as you propose.

M. M. Rockwell, Troy, Pa. Doubtless the old Bibles so frequently mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have a market value, but that feature of the case does not interest us, while the antiquity of the book and its completeness and state of preservation are worth recording.

THE FIRST JOURNEY ACROSS THE CONTINENT BY AUTOMOBILE

In a recent issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave an account of the revolution which has begun in transportation since the introduction of the automobile as a road conveyance. The horseless carriage is now to be seen in many American cities, and even in some of the smaller towns. In Europe, it has made great progress, and is fast superseding the horse as a popular means of travel. It is a common incident now in any city abroad to see the auto-cars wheeling along, and journeys "across the Continent" are frequent. The first riders to attempt an automobile trans-continental tour in the United States are Mr. John D. Davis and wife, who are now on the way from New York to San Francisco. They use a gasoline engine to propel the machine. The coach is built like a phaeton and hooded, and the wheels are of the ordinary bicycle pattern. Our photograph shows them at the outset of their journey.

Mr. F. L. Smith, who has been conducting the Y. M. C. A. work at San Juan, Porto Rico, writing with regard to the proposition to send American missionaries there says: "It would be useless to send them from here until the middle of September at the earliest, owing to climatic conditions."

E. H. (a reader of this journal) writes from Waterbury, Conn., giving this incident of answered prayer:

We had bidden mother, as we thought, a last goodbye. She had lapsed into unconsciousness. As I sat beside her, the thought suddenly came into my mind—"Why should your mother die? Is God's arm shortened? Is there not a great Physician? Remember him who cured all manner of diseases!" Without leaving my seat, I lifted up my heart to God and I prayed, oh, so fervently! I said: "O, thou Divine Healer, I know that thou art able to do this thing. If it be thy will, for thy name's sake heal her and let the change come right now, that

Soul-Winning . . . in Chicago

The Work of the Pacific Garden Mission Among the Destitute and the Fallen

THERE has lately been a revival of interest in city missions in Chicago that is most encouraging. The field is a large and needy one, and missions have not failed through lack of converts. The great drawback has been a lack of funds for carrying on the work and of interest on the part of the city's wealthy men. It is generally admitted that there are fewer missions there in proportion to the population than in any other large city in the United States. Missions have been established from time to time, and they have done a good work while they lasted, but just as they were getting well started the funds have invariably failed and the work has been discontinued through necessity. The recent revival of interest, however, foreshadows a substantial increase of city missions.

A GOSPEL SERVICE AT THE PACIFIC GARDEN MISSION, CHICAGO

At present there is but one mission which can be called a landmark—the old Pacific Garden Mission, which has been established for more than twenty-one years. It stands at 100 East Van Buren street, which is one of the greatest centres of vice in the western metropolis. Surrounded by saloons and gambling-dens, the mission sheds a cheerful light on every side, and none can estimate the good that has been accomplished through its influence. Thousands of homeless, discouraged men and women pass the mission every day and evening, and the door is always open for them to enter. Many despondent creatures have there been won back from sinful lives. Its gospel wagon is well known in the Chicago streets, and its workers are active, consecrated men and women. The mission is now in charge of Mrs. Sarah D. Clarke, who is carrying on the work which was begun by her able husband.

Van Buren street, where the mission is located, is an artery of trade. Many saloons stand ready to give a high rent for the hall occupied by the mission.

"But we cannot think of moving," said Mrs. Clarke. "We have been here so long that it would be like doing away with a landmark for us to move; and there is no better location for a mission in Chicago. Here, amid the city's worst dens of evil, we are like a light-house in a stormy sea. On cold winter nights it is hard for young men and women to pass this cheerful place, with its warm fire, its light, and its music. Many are attracted by these things; and once inside, we try to sow the good seed. It may not bear fruit before our eyes, but we feel that one day it will. There are hundreds of men in here every night, and a good many women, too. The number of conversions is encouraging, considering our location. Many strangers who pass the place come in out of curiosity. They may not be influenced at the time, but later on the lesson goes to their heart. Then we hear from them, thanking us for the good which has resulted in a change in their lives. These letters come from every part of the country.

"On several occasions," she added, "I have received letters from women whose husbands visited the mission while in Chicago. The wives write to thank us for the reform that has been brought about in their husband's lives. Sometimes the work is very discouraging. We have a constant struggle to obtain funds, and, if it were not for a few good friends, we would probably be obliged to give it up."

And those who have the good of Chicago at heart hope that the conductors of the Pacific Garden Mission will long be able to continue the work. Mrs. Clarke herself contributed $729 toward the support of the mission during the last year, besides giving her services. The total expenses of the year were $5,111, all being met by voluntary contributions.

Tent and Wagon Gospel Work

For some time past excellent Gospel work has been going on at Norwalk, Conn., under canvass, a tent and wagon being employed. This work is the outcome of a desire on the part of Rev. W. H. Hubbard to reach the non-church-going masses. With the aid of a tent, planted in the heart of the city, surrounded by saloons steam and trolley cars, business places and pleasure-seekers; and with a Gospel wagon for preaching in the large factories at noon hours, Jesus and the story of his love have been presented to many, who rarely, if ever, attend the regular church services. Many have been reached and influenced for good, and the work is still going on. Some who had not attended church in twenty-two years are now regular attendants, "Clothed and in their right mind." Some, who for over five years never came home Saturday night with wages and sober, have quit drinking and are now known as model husbands and fathers.

Helping the Texas Flood Sufferers

Relief Work Going on in the Brazos Valley—Scenes of Desolation

RELIEF work is bravely going forward in the Brazos Valley, Texas. The country devastated is four times the size of Massachusetts, and within this area people will raise neither wheat to eat nor cotton to sell this year. Cotton was whitening and corn ripening when the cloudbursts came and the Brazos and its tributaries overflowed, sweeping away homes, furniture, clothing, food, and all means of subsistence for thousands of people. From many cities the hand of help has been extended, but many sufferers are still unrelieved. The unafflicted counties of Texas are doing their duty, and the Governor and central and local relief committees have been energetic in relief operations. Governor Sayers has bought and distributed quantities of seeds, paying for them out of the relief fund. Kaffir corn, field peas, turnips, and German millet are being planted wherever practicable. A planter in Richmond says that it will take his county and the surrounding country twenty-five years to recover. As the waters receded, sickness was to be expected from the thousands of dead animals. One report says: "Meal arrived. We need more; have 900 to feed. Please send medicines or you will have to send some coffins."

The Galveston News describes many scenes sufficient to move the hearts of all who have sympathy for the sufferers. That journal says:

> Water, nothing but red, muddy water as far as the eye could reach. . . . Helpless women and children in trees and on house-tops for days, under a roasting sun with little or nothing to eat. . . . Now and then appeared a farm house nearly submerged, and close along the shore cattle walking back and forth, up to their necks in water and not knowing how to get out. . . . Rushing currents, cattle and deer upon the porches of buildings, a lone citizen in a dug-out, men, women and children gathered on tops of buildings . . . from Waco to the gulf, magnificent crop prospects converted into one long black waste of ruin and desolation.

A rescue party of nine men who went out in three boats from Wallis, Austin Co., told a similar story:

> Water, water, everywhere; nothing but water. Here and there we could see a house-top or cattle or household goods, floating melons and pumpkins and kershaws by the thousand. Not a foot of bottom land visible. We saved much bedding, cut through roofs of houses and dived in from seven to ten feet of water. One man refused to leave his house and was carried out through the roof with his wife and nine children. The suffering of families who have lost their all is very great. Many are entirely destitute.

THE STAR GARDEN, PHILADELPHIA

The destitute people must be kept alive until work is found. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already forwarded $1,000 to Governor Sayers to be used for the relief of the flood sufferers; and if any of our readers wish to cooperate in this good work, any contribution they may send for this purpose will be acknowledged in these columns. The following sums have been received: W. E. Sealwell, $5.05; C. A. Hagaman, $5.

Philadelphia's "Penny Luncheons"

Luncheon for one cent! The institution which provides this is unique. It has been in practical operation in Philadelphia for three years, and last year 56,316 penny lunches were served to school children alone. Star Centre, where the work of serving penny lunches goes on with increased popularity, is in the most crowded district of the Quaker City. On every side the slums lean up against its walls or wander away through endless courts and alleys. For squares there is not a decent restaurant or eating-stand. Promptly at noon the doors of the public schools in the neighborhood are thrown open and crowds of hungry school children pour into the streets and head for Star Centre, at the corner of Seventh and Lombard Sts. Each child has its penny, and each penny means a meal. Our photograph shows where the work began.

The Star Kitchen comprises coffee-house, bakery and kitchen proper. One can drop in at any hour of the day and find guests there. If it be breakfast the meal is corn meal, mush with milk, coffee with milk and sugar; if dinner, Irish stew of beef and potatoes, flavored with onion, bread and boiled rice; and supper, baked pork, beans and bread.

There are other features of interest connected with the place, notably the Thrift Clubs, the Stamp Savings Centre and the Work Bureau. The latter was opened only last June as an attempt to meet the constant demands for employment. At the Savings Centre a director receives sums on deposit and gives in exchange a stamp certifying the amount, which is used as a receipt. This is directly connected with one of the city savings banks. The Thrift Clubs are two in number, the Co-operative Coal Club, which aims to provide its members with coal at wholesale rates, and the Cooperative Shoe Club, which assists its members in procuring shoes.

After the expenses of the clubs are paid there is a small surplus for illustrated lectures, according to Rochdale cooperative plan. Four lectures were given last year by the Coal Club, followed by a social tea.

∴ Christianity as a Delusion ∴

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Ezek. 21: 21, . . . He made his arrows bright, he consulted with images, he looked in the liver

WE [illegible] by which the King of Babylon proposed to find out the will of God. He took a bundle of arrows, put them together, mixed them up, then pulled forth one, and by the inscription on it decided what city he should first assault. Then an animal was slain, and by the lighter or darker color of the liver, the brighter or darker prospect of success was inferred. That is the meaning of the text: "He made his arrows bright, he consulted with images, he looked in the liver." Stupid delusion! And yet all the ages have been filled with delusions. It seems as if the world loves to be hoodwinked, the delusion of the text only a specimen of a vast number of deceits practiced upon the human race. The Delphic Oracle deceived multitudes of people; the Pythoness seated in the Temple of Apollo uttering a crazy jargon from which the people guessed their individual or national fortunes or misfortunes. The utterances were of such a nature that you could read them anyway you wanted to read them. A general coming forth to battle consulted the Delphic Oracle, and he wanted to find out whether he was going to be safe in the battle, or killed in battle, and the answer came forth from the Delphic Oracle in such words that if you put the comma before the word "never," it means one thing, and if you put the comma after the word "never," it means another thing just opposite. The message from the Delphic Oracle to the general was, "Go forth, return never in battle shalt thou perish." If he was killed, that was according to the Delphic Oracle; if he came home safely, that was according to the Delphic Oracle.

So the ancient auguries deceived the people. The priests of those auguries, by the flight of birds, or by the intonation of thunder, or by the inside appearance of slain animals, told the fortunes or misfortunes of individuals or nations. The sibyls deceived the people. The sibyls were supposed to be inspired women who lived in caves and who wrote the sibylline books afterward purchased by Tarquin the Proud. And so in all ages, there have been necromancies, incantations, witchcrafts, sorceries, magical arts, enchantments, divinations and delusions. The one of the text was only a specimen of that which has been occurring in all ages of the world. None of these delusions accomplished any good. They deceived, they pauperized the people, they were as cruel as they were absurd.

But there are those who say that all these delusions combined are as nothing compared with the delusion now abroad in the world, the delusion of the Christian religion. That delusion has to-day four hundred million dupes. It proposes to encircle the earth with its girdle. That which has been called a delusion has already overshadowed the Appalachian range on this side the sea, and it has overshadowed the Balkan and Caucasian ranges on the other side the sea. It has conquered England and the United States. This champion delusion, this hoax, this swindle of the ages, as it has been called, has gone forth to conquer the islands of the Pacific, and Melanesia and Micronesia and Malayan Polynesia, have already surrendered to the delusion. Yea, it has conquered the Indian archipelago and Borneo, and Sumatra and Celebes and Java have fallen under its wiles. In the Fiji Islands, where there are 120,000 people, 102,000 have already become the dupes of this Christian religion, and if things go on as they are now going on, and if the influence of this great hallucination of the ages cannot be stopped, it will swallow the globe. Supposing then that Christianity is the delusion of the centuries, as some have pronounced it, I propose to show you what has been accomplished by this chimera, this fallacy, this hoax, this swindle of the ages.

And in the first place I remark, that this delusion of the Christian religion has made wonderful transformations of human character. I will go down the aisle of any church in Christendom, and I will find on either side that aisle those who were once profligate, profane, unclean of speech, and unclean of action, drunken and lost. But by the power of this delusion of the Christian religion they have been completely transformed, and now they are kind and amiable and genial and loving and useful. Everybody sees the change. Under the power of this great hallucination they have quit their former associates, and whereas they once found their chief delight among those who gambled and swore and raced horses, now they find their chief joy among those who go to prayer-meetings and churches; so complete is the delusion. Yea, their own families have noticed it—the wife has noticed it, the children have noticed it. The money that went for rum now goes for books and for clothes and for education. He is a new man. All who know him say there has been a wonderful change. What is the cause of this change? This great hallucination of the Christian religion.

Ah! that is the remarkable thing about this delusion of Christianity, it overpowers the strongest inteilects. Gather the critics, secular and religious, of this century together, and put a vote to them as to which is the greatest book ever written, and by large majority they will say Paradise Lost. Who wrote Paradise Lost? One of the fools who believed in this Bible, John Milton. Benjamin Franklin surrendered to this delusion, if you may judge from the letter that he wrote to Thomas Paine, begging him to destroy the Age of Reason, in manuscript, and never let it go into type: and writing afterward, in his old days: "Of this Jesus of Nazareth I have to say that the system of morals he left, and the religion he has given us are the best things the world has ever seen or is likely to see." Patrick Henry, the electric champion of liberty enslaved by this delusion, so that he says: "The book worth all other books put together is the Bible." Benjamin Rush, the leading physiologist and anatomist of his day, the great medical scientist—what did he say? "The only true and perfect religion is Christianity." Isaac Newton, the leading philosopher of his time—what did he say? That man surrendering to this delusion of the Christian religion, crying out: "The sublimest philosophy on earth is the philosophy of the Gospel." David Brewster, at the pronunciation of whose name every scientist the world over uncovers his head, David Brewster, saying: "Oh! this religion has been a great light to me, a very great light all my days." President Thiers, the great French statesman, acknowledging that he prayed when he said: "I invoke the Lord God in whom I am glad to believe." David Livingstone, able to conquer the lion, able to conquer the panther, able to conquer the savage, yet conquered by this delusion, this hallucination, this great swindle of the ages, so when they find him dead they find him on his knees. William E. Gladstone, the strongest intellect in England, unable to resist this chimera, this fallacy, this delusion of the Christian religion, went to the house of God every Sabbath, and often at the invitation of the rector, read the prayers to [illegible] overborne by this delusion, what chance is there for you and for me?

Besides that, I have noticed that first-rate infidels cannot be depended on for steadfastness in the proclamation of their sentiments. Goethe, a leading sceptic, was so wrought upon by this Christianity that in a weak moment he cried out: "My belief in the Bible has saved me in my literary and moral life." Rousseau, one of the most eloquent champions of infidelity, spending his whole life warring against Christianity, cries out: "The majesty of the Scriptures amazes me." Altemont, the notorious infidel, one would think he would have been safe against this delusion of the Christian religion. O! no. After talking against Christianity all his days, in his last hours he cried out: "O! Thou blasphemed but most indulgent Lord God, hell itself is a refuge if it hide me from thy frown." You can not depend upon these first-rate infidels: you cannot depend upon their power to resist this great delusion of Christianity. Thomas Paine, the god of modern sceptics, his birthday celebrated in New York and Boston with great enthusiasm — Thomas Paine, the paragon of Bible haters—Thomas Paine, about whom his brother infidel, William Carver, wrote in a letter which I have at my house, saying that he drank a quart of rum a day and was too mean and too dishonest to pay for it—Thomas Paine, the adored of modern infidelity—Thomas Paine, who stole another man's wife in England and brought her to this country—Thomas Paine, who was so squalid and so loathsome and so drunken, and so profligate, and so beastly in his habits, sometimes picked out of the ditch, sometimes too filthy to be picked out—Thomas Paine, one would have thought that he could have been depended on for steadfastness against this great delusion. But no. In his dying hour he begs the Lord Jesus Christ for mercy. Powerful delusion, all-conquering delusion, earthquaking delusion of the Christian religion. Yea, it goes on, it is so impertinent and it is so overbearing, this chimera of the Gospel, that, having conquered the great picture galleries of the world, the old masters and the young masters, it is not satisfied until it has conquered the music of the world. Haydn deluded with this religion until he wrote the "Creation." Handel deluded until he wrote the oratorios of "Jephthah" and "Esther" and "Saul" and "Israel in Egypt" and the "Messiah." Three thousand deluded people singing of a delusion to eight thousand deluded hearers.

Yes, this chimera of the Gospel is not satisfied until it goes on and builds itself into the most permanent architecture, so it seems as if the world is never to get rid of it. What are some of the finest buildings in the world? St. Paul's, St. Peter's, and the churches and cathedrals of all Christendom. Yes, this impertinence of the Gospel, this vast delusion, is not satisfied until it projects itself and in one year gives, contributes, $6,250,000 to foreign missions, the work of which is to make dunces and fools on the other side of the world—people we have never seen. Deluded doctors—two hundred and twenty physicians meeting week by week in London, in the Union Medical Prayer Circle to worship God.

Deluded lawyers — Lord Cairns, the highest legal authority in England, the ex-adviser of the throne spending his vacation in preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the poor people of Scotland. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, once Secretary of State, an old-fashioned Evangelical Christian, an elder in the Reformed Church. John Bright, a deluded Quaker. Henry Wilson, the Vice-President of the United States, dying a deluded Methodist or Congregationalist. Earl of Kintore dying a deluded Presbyterian.

The cannibals in South Sea, the bushmen of Terra del Fuego, the wild men of Australia, putting down the knives of their cruelty, and clothing themselves in decent apparel—all under the power of this delusion. Judson and Doty and Abeel and Campbell and Williams and the three thousand missionaries of the Cross turning their backs on home and civilization and comfort, and going out amid the squalor of heathenism to relieve it, to save it, to help it, toiling until they dropped into their graves, dying with no earthly comfort about them, and going [illegible] when they might have lived in this country, and lived for themselves, and lived luxuriously, and been at last put into brilliant sepulchres. What a delusion!

And to show the immensity of this de[illegible] of Jesus Christ. I open a hospital and I bring into that hospital the death-beds of a great many Christian people, and I take you by the hand and I walk up and down the wards of that hospital, and I ask a few questions. I ask, "Dying Stephen, what have you to say?" "Lord, Jesus, receive my spirit." "Dying John Wesley, what have you to say?" "The best of all is God is with us." "Dying Edward Payson, what have you to say?" "I float in a sea of glory." "Dying John Bradford, what have you to say?" "If there be any way of going to heaven on horseback, or in a fiery chariot, it is this." "Dying Paul, what have you to say?" "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand: I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. O! death, where is thy sting? O! grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

O! my Lord, my God, what a delusion, what a glorious delusion. Submerge me with it, fill my eyes and ears with it, put it under my head for a pillow—this delusion—spread it over me for a canopy, put it underneath me for an outspread wing—roll it over me in ocean surges ten thousand fathoms deep. If infidelity, and if atheism, and if annihilation are a reality, and the Christian religion is a delusion, give me the delusion.

The strong conclusion of every reasonable man and woman is that Christianity producing such grand results cannot be a delusion. A lie, a cheat, a swindle, a hallucination cannot launch such a glory of the centuries. Your logic and your common sense convince you that a bad cause cannot produce an illustrious result: out of the womb of such a monster no such angel can be born. There are many who began with thinking that the Christian religion was a stupid farce, who have come to the conclusion that it is a reality. And if some of you would give your experience you would give it in scholarly style, and others giving their experience would give it in broken style, but the one experience would be just as good as the other. Some of you have read everything. You are scientific and you are scholarly, and yet if I should ask you, "What is the most sensible thing you ever did?" you would say, "The most sensible thing I ever did was to give my heart to God."

But there may be others who have not had early advantages, and if they were asked to give their experience, they might rise and give such testimony as the man gave in a prayer meeting when he said: "On my way here to-night, I met a man who asked me where I was going. I said, 'I am going to prayer-meeting.' He said, 'There are a good many religions and I think the most of them are delusions: as to the Christian religion, that is only a notion, that is a mere notion, the Christian religion.' I said to him: "Stranger, you see that tavern over there?" 'Yes,' he said. 'I see it.' 'Don't you see me?' 'Yes, of course, I see you.' Now, the time was when everybody in this town knows if I had a quarter of a dollar in my pocket I could not pass that tavern without going in and getting a drink: all the people of Jefferson could not keep me out of that place; but God has changed my heart, and the Lord Jesus Christ has destroyed my thirst for strong drink, and there is my whole week's wages, and I have no temptation to go in there: and, stranger, if this is a notion, I want to tell you it is a mighty powerful notion: it is a notion that has put clothes on my childrens' back, and it is a notion that has put good food on our table, and it is a notion that has filled my mouth with thanksgiving to God. And, stranger, you had better go along with me, you might get religion, too.'"

Well, we will soon understand it all. Your life and mine will soon be over. We will soon come to the last bar of the music, to the last act of the tragedy, to the last page of the book—yea, to the last line and to the last word, and to you and to me it will either be midnoon or midnight!

In Assam's : : : : Pretty Tea-Gardens

Missionary Joseph Paul Writes of Gospel Work Among the Coolie Laborers of the Far East

DIBRUGARH contains a larger number of tea-gardens than any district in Assam; and, for its size more than any other district in the world. The natives of Assam will not take employment on these gardens, so coolies have all to be imported from India.

TEA-SIFTERS AT WORK

Although our missionaries have, for some years, been carrying on successful missionary work amongst this class of people in other disticts of the country, nothing had been done in the Dibrugarh district until October '98. For some weeks previous to this, I had been forming the acquaintance of several of the European planters, and after some difficulty, had obtained their permission to preach the Gospel to the coolies. Not every planter grants this privilege. On the 13th of October, in company with two native preachers, I entered upon this work, by going into a very large garden where 3,500 of these people are employed. We unrolled our mission pictures and sang a hymn. Quite a large crowd gathered about us. We explained our purpose in going amongst them, and then began to preach the Gospel of a free and full salvation through faith in the merits of the sinless Son of God. The people gave good attention, and some few made quiet inquiries when the preaching was over. They were instructed and encouraged to decide for Christ, which five of them did.

During another visit, a few weeks afterwards, I found five more believers, and when they were all baptized I organized a small church, appointing one of their number who could read, as leader. Being anxious to reach a place where, on Sundays, a very large market is held, and where thousands of these people gather to buy and sell, we left the place of our beginning. On Sunday morning, as soon as the crowd had gathered, we spread out our salable books on the ground, and then sang. In ten minutes, five or six hundred faces were turned toward us. We told these eager people the old, old story of Jesus and his power to save the worst of sinners. We then began to sell Testaments and Scriptures in several languages. So eager were the crowds to buy the Gospels that in about an hour 450 copies in Assamese, Bengali and Hindi were sold.

A pleasant incident on this particular morning, occurred when two old Christian brothers, from one of our churches in another district, came with beaming faces and outstretched hands, saying "Yesu Sohoi" (Jesus helps). These people were so glad that we had come among them that they asked us to come out to the garden where they lived—about three miles away—to hold a prayer-meeting. That day before the sun went down, old Christians were revived, new ones believed, and the Lord was greatly glorified.

IN A TEA-GARDEN

The next day, having asked and obtained permission to preach in the lines of the tea-garden, where the two Christians who met us at the market lived, we went there. The people gathered in crowds to hear the Word, and asked "what must we do?" Some believed, others were hardened. In the evening we held a prayer-meeting in one of the Christians' homes. Sixteen fully prepared to follow the Lord. They have been faithful and are now baptised. With these sixteen and the two old Christians, a church was organized. It now has a membership of thirty.

At the next place we visited a few believed and were baptised in due time. Here also a church has been organized, which now numbers sixteen. And so our visit to the market and sale of the Scriptures advertised us. We were expected at every place. At one very large tea-garden, where about four thousand laborers are employed, I found an old Christian who had kept faithful amid awful temptations. For years he had had no one to encourage him and no opportunity to attend Gospel services. He met me, saying: "I have been praying for this day. Let us have a meeting to-night in the tea-house." We did so, and, strange to note, sixteen was the number again who confessed that they were hungering and thirsting for the Bread of Life.

Many interesting and encouraging things could be told of the work our Lord is doing by and through his missionary servants in adjoining districts among this same class of people. First to be mentioned is the labor of Rev. C. E. Petrick, who has seen, during his ten years of labor, a gradual development from a few believers to a total church membership of 652 in the Sibsagar district. Branching out from this is the work undertaken in the North Lakhimpur district by Rev. John Firth five years ago. His labors have been wonderfully blessed; there are quite as many organized churches as there are tea estates; yet the most permanent work is done in the villages, which have been formed by coolies having served their full time on the estates and settled on land of their own, thus becoming free from the authority of any planters, and foreshadowing the time when people of this class will become useful and important factors in the wellbeing of the Province of Assam. Mr. Firth reports over 350 baptisms within his period of service. Rev. O. L. Swanson was for a while in the North Lakhimpur district, but later he began work in 1897 in the Golaghat district, where within the period of a year and a half he has seen added to the number of the redeemed about one hundred and four souls. Then, in connection with other work in the Nowgong district, Rev. P. H. Moore has preached in the gardens and in coolie villages in that district, and has two organized churches, with a total membership of 143.

Thus it is plainly seen that wherever work has been done amongst this class of people success has followed. The great drawbacks are the oppositions by the European planters and the great ignorance and superstition of the people; yet we trust that the consistent lives of the Christians will remove the former at least to some extent, and that time and schools will change the latter to a general onward movement. To this end we both labor and pray, knowing that He who is for us is greater than any or all things which can be against us.

JOSEPH PAUL.

Child Redemption in Africa

ABANYARRA is a bright little native African girl with an excellent disposition. Rev. E. H. Richards, the well-known missionary, writes from Inhambane concerning her: "We wish to redeem Abanyarra, but it will cost $100. She is worth it. She will soon be sold by her parents to any one who has the cash, old or young, unless we pay for her and give her freedom to marry as she chooses. She can read and write, knows the multiplication tables, can make a bed, and cooks excellent pancakes. We need her services for the mission, but can never have her unless she is redeemed." Poor little Abanyarra is a type of multitudes of other African children who are bought and sold like cattle, without the slightest compunction on the part of the parents. When they are so fortunate as to be "redeemed" by purchase and freed by the missionaries, they almost invariably repay such kindness by leading exemplary lives of Christian usefulness and not infrequently become missionaries themselves in their turn, carrying the Gospel light into the benighted homes of their less fortunate fellow-Africans. In this way, hundreds of little African children have been "redeemed" from hopeless and heathen lives.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The River of Salvation

S. S. Lesson for August 20. Ezek. 47: 1-12
Golden Text, Rev. 22: 17

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THESE verses are part of a vision beginning with Ezek. 40: 1, when again he uses the striking expression: "The hand of the Lord was upon me." He had seen the vision of a rebuilt temple, in which Israel shall, in the millennium, worship the Lord, as he has willed to be worshiped, by those whom he has designated to be to him "a peculiar treasure . . . from all peoples . . . a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Exod. 19: 5, 6). God can never have a purpose which shall not, sooner or later, be fulfilled. All the sin and idolatry of his ancient people has never altered God's purposes for them. Generations may pass away failing to respond to him, but the Husbandman still waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth (James 5: 7). But when this vision of the prophet shall be realized, then "out of Zion shall go forth the law and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (Isa. 2: 3).

And he [whose hand was upon him] brought me back unto the door of the house; and behold, waters issued out from under the threshold of the house eastward. In the new heaven and the new earth (Isa. 65: 16, 17; Rev. 21: 1), there shall be "a river of water of life proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb" (Rev. 22: 1). May it not be that the temple on earth with its outflowing waters may answer to the throne of God in heaven, with its outflowing river of life: both heaven and earth made new; both fully answering the purpose for which God has made them? But what does the outflowing water signify except it be the Word of the Lord in the power of the Spirit, which shall go forth from Jerusalem? The Holy Spirit, who should be given when Jesus should be glorified, is called "rivers of living water" (John 7: 38, 39), and washing of water is by the Word (Eph. 5: 26), which has power to cleanse (John 15: 3).

The glory of the Lord, which had been taken away (Ezek. 11: 22, 23), had returned from the way of the east; his voice, which had been still so long, sounded again "like the sound of many waters, and the earth shined with his glory" (Ezek. 43: 2). And as God had entered into his temple, living waters could flow out "eastward," just where God had come in. No power of the Spirit of God can come forth from man or from temple where God has not come in to make his abode. No amount of learning, of intellectual study of the Word of God; no amount of past experience of his love and faithfulness can compensate for a lack of the present, moment-by-moment, in-dwelling of God: only life which dwells within can flow out. We cannot bring God near to men except in measure as we are, and continue to be ourselves filled with God, by continual faith in Christ and continual obedience to the Spirit.

The prophet must learn another lesson. Having seen the source of the waters within the house, he must know something about the stream which floweth forth. The man with the measuring line in his hand (Ezek. 40: 3, 4). Led him "round by the outer gate, by the way of the gate that looketh toward the east, and behold there ran out waters on the right side." The man then proceeded to measure or sound the waters. But instead of using a line for sounding, the prophet himself was to be the measure. He must pass through the waters, and the measure in which he disappeared told of the depth of the waters.

The first sounding showed the waters to be to the ankles; the prophet could stand in the water, but only his feet were hidden. How many Christians are like this! There is something of the Spirit in their lives, but much more is to be seen of them than of the Spirit; much more to be heard of them than of the Lord. In their preaching many more of their own words than of the Word of God. The water is only to the ankles. Again, "the man measured a thousand cubits, and he caused me to pass through the waters, waters that were to the knees." O, it is blessed when the waters reach the knees; when prayer is according to the Word, and prayed in the Holy Ghost (Judges 20)—not self-made prayers, like the clamor of a foolish child! The next sounding proved the water to be to the loins. More and more, as the water rose higher the man became more helpless. A stream, when the water is to the loins, nearly overpowers him.

Afterward he measured a thousand, and it was a river I could not pass through: for the waters were risen, waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed through. "Waters to swim in!" None can swim but they who learn to trust the water and make it their element for the time. But this is the true life of God. We do not need to feel our feet, we do not need to regulate or manufacture our own prayers, nor to imitate our own actions. Our part is only to trust the Holy Ghost to lead us, and to carry us in line with the Word of God, and when we know it to obey it unhesitatingly. This is as simple as breathing when we are fully yielded up to trust and to obey.

But this was not all. "Son of man," he said, "hast thou seen this?" and without waiting for an answer he brought the prophet to the brink of the river, where he saw very many trees, and he said, "By the river, upon the bank thereof, on this side and that, shall grow every tree for meat, whose leaf shall not wither, neither shall the fruit thereof fail: it shall bring forth new fruit every month, because the waters thereof issue out of the sanctuary; and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for healing;" or, more correctly, for health. Answering again to Rev. 22: 2, where, however, there is but one tree, "the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits." The diversity in the earthly lies in the trees, and in the time of their bearing. In the heavenly, the diversity is in the fruit, but all proceeds from the one tree, the tree of life, which is for food and for health for the redeemed.

The course of the river is the next thing to which the attention of the prophet is drawn. These waters issue forth toward the eastern region, and shall go down into the Arabah (or plain), and they shall go toward the sea . . . and the waters shall be healed." The sea can be only the Dead Sea, a wonderful type of the mass of souls "dead in trespasses and sins" which lie around us, at our very doors. Nothing can heal the deadly waters but the living Word in the power of the Holy Spirit, lived out and spoken by witnesses who have yielded themselves to go "as them that are alive from the dead and their members as instruments of righteousness unto God" (Rom. 6, 13). The inflow of living water quickens everything, but it must be living water in which man disappears more and more, that God himself may be brought into immediate, unhindered contact with those who know him not.

A man full of the Word of God and of his Spirit, whose life bears witness to the reality of God, brings life-power with him wherever he goes: "Everything shall live whithersoever the river cometh." But this is when it has become a river, not when it is only ankle deep, and there is still so much of man to be seen. How may we thus be life-givers to others? By yielding to God and trusting him.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

DOUBT as to the eventual return of the Hebrew exiles in Babylon has no place in Ezekiel's mind. He is sure that they will return, and his effort is directed to stimulating their hope of restoration and to preparing them for it. As last week's lesson showed, there was at that time no reasonable prospect of such a restoration. Palestine had become part of the Babylonian kingdom; men were satisfied with it, but the old men, who could remember Solomon's temple, wept as they thought of the difference (Ezra 3: 12). In one particular, however, Ezekiel's plan was executed. Solomon's temple had been profaned, in his priestly eyes, by the king's palace being so close to it that it seemed almost a part of the temple. He provides in his ideal plan for the whole summit of the hill being occupied by the temple and its courts. When the Hebrews returned, they had no king to provide for, so, as Ezekiel foresaw, there was no palace to divide with the temple the summit of the hill. But the most remarkable feature of the vision was the river described in the lesson. There could be nothing more desolate than the region which stretches between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea. Yet nothing was needed but water to turn that region into a fertile plain. This is proved by the fact that at Engedi, where there is water, there is vegetation. Ezekiel's conception of the restoration includes, as we saw in last week's lesson, an increase in the fertility of the land, and in this lesson he explains how it will come about. A river is to take its rise in the temple hill, a miraculous river which is to increase in depth as it proceeds, though it has no tributaries, and the irrigation thus provided is to make the desert fertile.

ENGEDI PAST WHICH EZEKIEL SAW THE RIVER FLOW

Waters issued out. We do not realize, as the people of an Oriental land do, the blessing of water. We see, all through the Bible, how much store they set by their wells, and how they dwell on the value of rivers. A well-watered country is their ideal of a good land to live in. It is therefore not surprising that Ezekiel, drawing a picture of Palestine as it would be when the people of Israel were restored to it, puts prominently in his picture his conception of a river. It stands for satisfaction for thirst, for cleansing and for irrigation. The prophet sees it taking its rise from under the rebuilt temple, where he had previously seen God manifesting his presence; so that the river proceeded from him. Thus, by this figure, he was telling his people that God could and would supply them with all that they needed. One of the most beautiful pictures of the great artist, Millais, is that of "the last trek." It is the death of a white hunter in the African desert. Those who have been in that land can appreciate the details of that picture of the dying man. Travelers have described them again and again. The thirsty man would give all his gold and everything he possessed for water. And he is mocked by that exasperating mirage, in which his mind conjures up before him a beautiful, cool lake, surrounded by palm trees. It does not appear far away, but the traveler knows it exists only in his imagination. It is a true type of the worldling, hoping to get satisfaction from money, or fame, or power, and finding them all unsatisfying to that thirst which God alone can satisfy with the water of life.

Very many trees. The water of the river was not only for drink and cleansing, but it brought fertility. A resident of Central Australia says that the change wrought by the wet season in that land can never be imagined by one who has not seen it. On one day the land will be hard and stony and without any sign of plant life. The fierce sun seems to have baked the soil into stone. Then come the rains in a deluge. In forty-eight hours the whole scene is changed. Grass is springing up everywhere, and countless seedlings, which grow rapidly, are bursting forth on all hands. Now there is life where all had been death. It is a sample of the hard heart on which the showers of blessing have fallen. Kindness, charity, love, show themselves where before there was only hate and malignity.

KING LEOPOLD OF BELGIUM THE SULTAN PRESIDENT McKINLEY EMPEROR WILLIAM QUEEN WILHELMINA THE CZAR QUEEN VICTORIA

UNITED FOR THE WORLD'S PEACE THE LEADING RULERS WHOSE GOVERNMENTS ARE BOUND E

PROBABLY no event of the present century is of more far-reaching significance than the International Peace Conference, which has just closed its labors at The Hague. First of its kind in the world's history, it is a hopeful presage of the approaching time when war and its horrors will be looked upon as a hideous memory of a semi-barbarian age, and when all disputes involving the rights of communities, nations and races will be adjusted by righteous arbitration.

Convened at a time when Europe's naval and military armaments were the largest ever known, and when clouds of war hung heavily on the Old World horizon, threatening momentarily to scatter their lightnings and embroil the leading powers in bitter strife, the Conference, notwithstanding many obstacles and antagonisms, has achieved a substantial triumph for peace and the principle of arbitration. At the last sitting it was announced that Germany, Austria, Hungary, Belgium, China, Denmark, S the United States, Mexico, France, Britain, Russia, Servia, Siam, Sweden, way, Switzerland, Turkey, Bulgaria, Japan, Luxembourg, Montenegro an Netherlands had all signed the final approving the work of the Conference recommending future conferences.

NG F SWEDEN KING AND QUEEN REGENT OF SPAIN EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA PRESIDENT LOUBET OF FRANCE THE MIKADO OF JAPAN KING HUMBERT OF ITALY

E PEACE CONFERENCE TREATIES TO SETTLE FUTURE INTERNATIONAL QUARRELS BY ARBITRATION

.itration Convention or Treaty was ed by sixteen governments; seventeen ed the declaration prohibiting the use o projectiles or explosives in balloons; s een signed the declaration prohibiting the u of asphyxiating gases, and fifteen re- d themselves as against explosive bul- l . Germany, Austria, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Turkey and four minor governments did not sign the Arbitration Convention, and the same States demurred at approving the treaties on the rules of land and naval warfare; but it is understood that after further consideration, nearly all the governments who have abstained from signing will join the other signatories.

By far the most important work of the Conference has been the scheme for mediation and arbitration. Briefly outlined, it provides that all the powers signing the Arbitration Treaty shall use their efforts to secure a peaceful solution of international differences; disagreeing governments will, before resorting to arms, invite the mediation of one or more friendly powers; powers not involved in the quarrel or dispute will spontaneously offer their services as mediators; such mediation may be offered at any time, even during war preparations, without offence; quarrelling States are to choose each two powers to avert rupture through mediation, the adjustment to rest exclusively with the mediators; international differences which cannot be determined by these means are to be referred to an International Committee of Inquiry, whose arbitration award, however, will still leave the disputing powers free to act as they may decide, although they will be morally bound to recognize the decision of such Committee (the general intent of the Treaty implying an agreement to submit in good faith to such decisions); the signatory powers reserve the right in special cases to make arbitration compulsory. In addition to the foregoing, the Treaty provides for the organization of a permanent Court of Arbitration, accessible at all times, with an international bureau at The Hague, and with a permanent General Secretary, by whom all the records and archives of the Arbitration Court will be kept. This court will consist of four qualified legal representatives from each power, their term to be for six years. To this court not only the powers who sign the Arbitration Treaty, but all other powers and governments, will have free access for the adjustment of international differences. Besides the court, there will be a permanent international administrative diplomatic council at The Hague, which will each year supply all the powers with reports of the labors of the Arbitration Court. Arbitration proceedings will be conducted secretly, but the final decisions of the court will be delivered publicly. The sessions will be conducted as in an ordinary court of law, both sides being heard by counsel.

It will thus be seen that the results of the world's first Peace Conference are of a character to afford sincere gratification to the friends of "peace and good-will among men." While Russia has the honor of initiating this most important movement, the American delegates have occupied a most prominent part and have done much to make it successful. In the work of this memorable Conference, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers have a special interest. As early as January 4, 1899, this journal urged its readers to write to the State Department in behalf of the appointment of a representative American Commission to the proposed Conference. The result was that thousands of letters poured in upon the Department, demonstrating beyond doubt the attitude of the Christian people of the United States as strongly favorable to the Conference. Our Government, recognizing the influence of public opinion, chose as its representatives in the Conference a most distinguished and able group of Americans, who gave to the Czar's proposals a hearty support, and who signalized our first participation in European councils by appearing as eloquent advocates of international peace and the brotherhood of the human race.

More could hardly have been reasonably expected of the first Peace Conference than what has been actually accomplished. For future Conferences there still remains the grave question of partial disarmament. But God's people everywhere must feel that their prayers have not been in vain, since the "mighty ones" have been assembled at the unanimous call of the nations, to consider whether the time has not come, in God's good providence, for his children to follow the paths of peace.

A Tribute to the Czar

Christian America will Congratulate Him on the Work of the Peace Congress

FRIENDS of peace the world over are to be congratulated on the results accomplished by the International Conference, which has just concluded its labors at The Hague. It has bound the great nations of the earth by moral obligations of the strongest and most solemn character, never again to resort to arms for the settlement of international quarrels, without first exhausting the resources of friendly mediation and arbitration. It is the deepest and most powerful thrust that has ever been dealt at the monster, War, and God grant that it may be followed up, in subsequent Conferences, by such indomitable assault that the barbaric trade of human slaughter, which has sown the earth with myriads of dead, and filled it with unspeakable sorrow, may forever disappear, and the blessings of peace may begin to be realized in every land beneath the sun.

For the Peace Congress and its immediate results, as well as for the splendid promise of the future which it has presented to the human race, the whole world is debtor to the Czar of Russia. It was his mind that conceived and his heart that had the courage to carry out the plan which has brought the nations together, as brothers, to prepare the way for the world's peace. Occupying the most powerful of earthly thrones, a despot by inheritance, and surrounded on all sides by the sternest militarism, he has been the open advocate of peace ever since he became Emperor. Setting all the warlike traditions of his own nation and of Europe aside, he has been imbued with a divine courage and confidence which impelled him to send his winged messengers of Peace flying across frontiers and seas, summoning the people to what has been in many respects, the most remarkable and auspicious assemblage in modern history.

All Christendom must hold up the hands of the Czar in his campaign for Universal Peace. It is due to him—amid the storm of criticism and opposition which the Conference has excited—that Christian America should be the first to signify its approval of his course, as it was the first to support the proposition for a Peace Congress. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, therefore, requests its readers everywhere to send in their signatures to be appended to a Mammoth Memorial which is now in preparation for presentation to the Czar, through our diplomatic representative at the court of St. Petersburg. That Memorial will express the sentiments of Christian America, and will be forwarded as soon as the list of names is complete.

Write your own name and address, and then secure the signatures of as many of your friends as possible. Act quickly. In order that all may be uniform, signatures should be written on sheets of white paper 8 inches in width and forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, N.Y., as speedily as possible.

Real Redemption

A year ago, writes Mr. Moody, the well-known evangelist, I was going away to preach one Sunday morning, when a young man drove up in front of us. He had an aged woman with him. "Who is that young man?" I asked. "Do you see [illegible] "and that land there with the house upon it?" "Yes." "His father drank that all up," said he; and he went on to tell all about him. His father was a great drunkard, squandered his property, died and left his wife in the poor-house. "And that young man is one of the finest young men I ever knew. He has toiled hard and earned money, and bought back the land; he has taken his mother out of the poor-house, and now he is taking her to church."

I thought, that is an illustration for me. The first Adam in Eden sold us for naught, but the Messiah, the second Adam came and bought us back again. The first Adam brought us to the poor-house; the second Adam makes us kings and priests unto God. That is redemption.

The Vision of St. Paul

(II. Cor. 12: 2-4)

(For "The Christian Herald")

WHAT were those soul-inspiring things,
To Paul's enraptured vision given,
When, upward borne on angel wings
He visited his home in heaven,
And feasted his adoring eyes
Upon the bliss of Paradise?

Perchance, he saw the Saviour's face
With everlasting glory beaming;
While gathered round his throne of grace,
Their golden harps in beauty gleaming,
The angel choirs, united, raise
The anthem of eternal praise.

And viewed the saints in white arrayed,
Reclining by the Crystal River,
Beneath the trees' celestial shade,
Whose healing verdure blooms forever;
While songs of triumph, sweet and clear,
Were wafted to his ravished ear.

Thenceforth all earthly gain was loss:
[illegible]
His brightest joy, the hallowed Cross,
In which, alone, his soul would glory:
He had one glimpse of heaven's shore,
And earth could charm him nevermore.

The martyred saints have testified,
That, as the raging flames ascended,
A view of Jesus, glorified,
Their ev'ry pain and sorrow ended;
Made them rejoice 'mid tortures dire,
And glory in consuming fire.

O, may our souls so dwell in love,
That faith shall view the Home before us,
Shall learn the song of joy above:
That, rising, we may join the chorus:
While all the glory of the skies
Shall seem familiar to our eyes.

Cromwell, Conn. —MARVIN R. WARNER.

Mr. Denham, and others addressed the meetings. The tent work will continue until cold weather.

Two missionaries are at work in Tibet. They are located in monasteries where they are familiarizing themselves with the literature and religious beliefs of the people, preparatory to more extended work. It is a fact not generally known that foreseeing the day when missionaries would be freely admitted to Tibet, consecrated men translated the Bible into Tibetan, so that it might be ready for immediate use. The New Testament was done by Heinrich August Jaeschke, a Moravian missionary of Herrnhut in Saxony, who also did most of the work on the Old Testament, but died before it was completed.

Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts will conduct a Summer School of Christian Patriotism on August 7-13, at Clifton Springs, N. Y., which will be free to all comers. It will be repeated during the week beginning August 21, at Saratoga, N. Y. These Summer schools are wonderfully interesting and stimulating. They take the form of a picture song story, showing the kingship of Christ in nature, scripture, history and social reform. Dr. Crafts [illegible] has the assistance in the musical part of the pro-

Repairing the Currency

WORK demanding unlimited patience and ingenuity is done in one of the quiet rooms in the Treasury at Washington, a corner of which has been photographed for this journal. To this room are taken the fragments of currency which are sent to the Treasury for redemption. When they are very badly mutilated, they are sent to the desk shown in the photograph, at which sits Mrs. Brown, a lady who has earned a high reputation as an expert in the art of piecing together the fragments and deciding their value. A large variety of accidents are represented by these relics. A heap of singed scraps have been found in the pocket of a person who has been accidentally burned, and it is the duty of the expert to find out how many bills and what denomination the scraps represent. On another day a number of tatters, not one larger than a dime, are brought to her with the story that the owner of the bills hid them away, and the mice or rats found them and chewed them up to make a nest. Bills are continually being mutilated in a host of strange ways, and the owners are anxious to have Uncle Sam give good bills in exchange for the fragments. To do the old gentleman justice, he is always willing to pay an honest debt, but he sometimes suspects, when a soiled bit of paper is presented to him, with the statement that it is part of a fifty-dollar bill, that it may have been part of a two or a five-dollar bill. Or he may have his doubts whether a quantity of fragments are parts of two or three bills of small denomination, or were, as the owner claims, parts of ten or twenty bills, worth twenty dollars each. Mrs. Brown's services are then in requisition, and after she has spent some hours in an occupation which probably recalls the old days when she put together a child's puzzle, she is able to tell how many bills are represented by the fragments, and has found out by the texture of the paper, or by the character of the silk threads running through it, what was the denomination of each bill. The number of such problems submitted to her daily shows that there are many people who have not taken Christ's advice:

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth where moth and rust doth corrupt and where thieves break through and steal (Matt. 6: 19).

A Grateful Protege

The financial columns of the New York daily journals had frequent references during the recent excitement in Wall street, to a country young man who made thousands of dollars in a week by shrewd speculation. It appears that the same speculator has since added eighty thousand dollars to his fortune by a transaction in Philadelphia. He has now returned to his native town in Wayne County, New York, to perform some very pleasant duties. His first visit was to an aged aunt who cared for him in his infancy and early boyhood. He examined her house and sent for upholsterers who laid down new carpets. Orders were sent for new furniture, and the residence has been well furnished from garret to basement. His next visit was to two widow ladies for whom he used to work as a farm hand. They had treated him well, and when his financial ability developed, they raised two thousand dollars by mortgaging their farm, to give him the capital for his first venture. He repaid the mortgage, and then proceeded to put the old farm house in good repair inside and out. New furniture was introduced there, too, and one morning the ladies found a beautiful horse and phaeton in their barn as a present from their protege. Besides this, he left a substantial gift in money for their use. Probably not one of the three ladies ever expected so munificent a reward. It is unusual in this world, but in the next there will be many astonished at the reward given to them for services performed with no expectation of recompense.

Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord when saw we thee a-hungered and fed thee? (Matt. 25: 37).

The Kissing Bug

For several weeks past the daily journals have been reporting instances of persons suffering painful injury from the bite of an insect, which as it usually attacks the lips, has become known as "the kissing bug." Dr. L. O. Howard, chief of the Division of Entomology, of the Agricultural Department, in Washington, has received from all parts of the country specimens of bugs, which the senders accused of being the kissing bug. Most of them were entirely innocent of the charge, but Dr. Howard has received some which are well identified. He says that the true name of the insect is Opsecoetes personatui, which seems an imposing name for so small a creature. But those who have been bitten think that it deserves a formidable name. The lips on which it alights swell to an enormous size, and the pain experienced is acute. Dr. Howard says that the insect is not a new variety, though certain peculiarities of the weather have caused it to multiply to an extraordinary degree. In many cases the people who have been bitten have increased their sufferings by their own nervous fears. Having heard or read of the insect, they have become alarmed when they were bitten, and their nervousness has caused additional irritation. The bite of the bug is not dangerous, and the cases of severe swelling are due to its having had its beak in putrid or decaying matter. Unhappily, moral poison is disseminated in the same way. People whose minds are filled with the filth of some novels and newspapers, carry an infection with them into society and corrupt others:

Be not deceived: Evil communications corrupt good manners (I. Cor. 15: 33).

The Home of the Diamond

News comes from the diamond-fields of South Africa of the solution of an interesting problem. Geologists have long been divided in opinion as to the origin of the gem. Some held that it was formed in the clay in which it was found and probably through the action of water intensely hot. Others believed that it was formed in rock through mighty pressure and had been broken and afterwards imbedded in the clay. Observation has shown that the clay in which the diamond is found is on the surface of a brownish-buff color, which the miners call "yellow ground." Deeper down it becomes blue and is called "blue ground." This is generally of a circular shape and goes down to unknown depths. At Kimberley, in South Africa, it has been excavated to a depth of fourteen hundred feet. It contains boulders not unlike granite, which have evidently been at some remote age subjected to extreme heat. The shape of the "blue ground" and its peculiar formation suggested a theory which has now been proved to be true. The "blue ground" was once the shaft or funnel from the crater of a volcano. In the interior among its molten lava, the diamond was formed, and in some eruption it was torn from its abode in the rocks and hurled with mighty force upward into the clay where it is now found. Thus it is with God's jewels. Though they are found in human clay, the power which made them what they are was perfected in the furnace of fierce suffering.

But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of us (II. Cor. 4: 7).

A President Assassinated

News comes from San Domingo in the West Indies, that the President of that island, Gen. Ulysses Heureaux, has been assassinated. According to the meagre reports received, President Heureaux was aware that an insurrection was impending, and went to Moca in the province of Cibas to arrange measures for meeting it. He was about to return, and was sitting on a veranda waiting for his horse to be brought to him, when an aged beggar approached and asked for alms. While the President was in the act of relieving him, a man named Caceres rushed up behind him and fired two shots from a revolver, one of which passed through the President's heart, killing him instantly. The other shot killed the beggar whom the President was relieving. Heureaux was a man of fifty-three years of age, who had led an adventurous life. On several occasions, while a young man, he had taken part in insurrections. As a result of a successful revolt, he became President in 1882, and has remained in power ever since. His assassin, Caceres, was known to have had relations with the malcontents, but his personal animosity to the President was due, it is said, to the fact that Heureaux had put his father to death. His act may precipitate a revolution, but, at latest accounts, the Vice-President had assumed office and believed that he could maintain order. San Domingo is of special historical interest, on account of its claim to have been the first land in this hemisphere on which Columbus set foot. Its people contend that the remains of the great discoverer are contained in an ancient casket sacredly preserved on the island, and hold that the casket which the Spaniards recently with so much ceremony removed from Cuba to Seville could not have held the body of Columbus. It may be difficult to decide which is right in this historical dispute, but there can be no question that the turbulence and disorder in Hayti, like the tyranny and misgovernment of Spain in Cuba, have been such as Columbus would have been ashamed of. It would be better for both that they vied in showing the world which possessed his principles rather than disputing as to which possesses his bones. Christ had occasion to rebuke that spirit in his day:

CASKET IN SAN DOMINGO SAID TO CONTAIN COLUMBUS' BONES

Truly ye bear witness that ye allow the deeds of your fathers: for they indeed killed them and ye build their sepulchres (Luke 11: 48).

A Divorce Refused

A remarkable reason was given recently by a judge at Louisville, Ky., for refusing to grant a divorce. The application was made by the husband on the ground that the wife was an habitual drunkard. The husband had been a widower for less than four months when he married the defendant. All his relatives and ten disinterested neighbors gave evidence against her. Nevertheless, the judge declined to dissolve the marriage, saying: "Such precipitancy in marriage implies a want of ordinary care in making a proper selection of a wife. It is an evidence of contributory negligence on his part. If he has been injured or disappointed the reason is that he has lacked prudence. Marriage is not an experiment. It is a solemn, sacred compact, to be entered into soberly, discreetly, in the fear of God. It is a contract for better or for worse." This is probably the first time that the element of contributory negligence has ever entered into divorce proceedings. Perhaps, if other judges take the same view, there may not be so many hasty marriages as there now are. But it is very difficult to teach men that they must bear the consequences of their own blunders.

Thine eyes are open upon all the ways of the sons of men, to give every one according to his ways and according to the fruits of his doings (Jer. 32:19).

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

The Old-Times Shoemaker

How the Children Watched Him Work. He is Seen in Some Cities Still

THE shoemaker was once a person of large importance in country villages and rustic neighborhoods. The city was a long distance away, railroads were not running everywhere; store-shoes were rare possessions. Skins were brought to the cobbler; with ruler and tape-line he took careful measurement, and then with knife and awl and waxed threads—with a single hog-bristle at the end of each thread doing duty as a needle—he fashioned your shoes, well or ill, according to his skill. The shoemaker's shop divided honors with the smithy as the centre of attraction for the children of the village. They liked to gather around the cobbler's door and watch him at his trade; they had an idea that they could make quite as good shoes if they only had a chance; they picked up bits of cast-off leather, and if he was good-natured they borrowed an awl and needle and waxed thread and made experiments, which shook the faith they had in themselves. Sometimes, however, an apt little lad showed that he had a knack at shoemaking, and, perhaps, was elevated to the dignity of apprenticeship, and in course of time, when the good old cobbler passed, reigned supreme on his bench.

While the old-fashioned cobbler is not in request as formerly, and few country districts depend on him for new foot-gear, he is still very necessary to comfort when it comes to "half-soling" old shoes and putting patches over holes; he is even a feature of city life. In busy, hustling New York, his modest sign hangs out here and there; a tiny room, almost "a hole in the wall," accommodates him; possibly you find him down in a cellar at the foot of a flight of stairs. You have worn your heels down on one side; he builds them up for fifteen cents or more, and he half-soles neatly for various prices. He, like his brother the blacksmith, looks just as he did in the village where you lived when you were a little girl or boy; the bench, the leather apron, the awl, the waxed threads, the last (or shoe-mould) and pincers, are all parts of a picture that links you to your past. The horse has given place to the steam-cars, steam to electricity, but the shoemaker seems unchanged. Until the beginning of this century he had things all his own way; only in 1808 was there any successful application of machinery to shoemaking, when David Meade Randolph obtained a patent "for fastening the soles and heels to the inner soles by means of little nails, etc.," through a mechanical clinching process.

In that part of New Orleans known as "Vieux Carre," and which is the old or French city, quaint-looking shoemakers and odd little shoe shops are still much in evidence on some of the poorer streets. After describing the fruit stalls, junk shops, stands where blouses, tea-kettles, flagiolets, and other incongruous things are sold, a visitor says: "Here, too, a cobbler has taken possession of the sidewalk and is hammering away."

Chinese Politeness

Chinese etiquette takes more literal acceptance of the fact that "gray hairs are honorable" than does our own. The story goes that a Mandarin who was entertaining Prince and Princess Henry of Prussia, asked the former politely, "How old are you?" (as it will be remembered Li Hung Chang asked of everybody he met when he was over here). "About twenty-six," said the prince. "Your Highness appears fifty," said the Mandarin warmly; and then urbanely assured the Princess that she looked every bit of sixty.

Bird-Nests in Church

Places of worship have always been building-places for birds. An English paper recently gave an account of robins which had recently built their nests in an organ-pipe of a church at Bournemouth; and related the following story of a red-breast which made its home in a pew:

[illegible] Sunday [illegible] Mr. Sugden [illegible] [illegible] part of [illegible]

Park chapel, Oxfordshire, they found a half-made robin's nest on the bookledge between a hymn-book and a prayer-book. They decided to retire to another seat in favor of the little red-breast intruder, and, by the following Sunday, the nest was not only finished, but five eggs had been laid in it. During the whole of the next Sunday service the robin sat in the nest, and it was subsequently found that four young robins had been hatched. For two or three Sundays afterward the attentive mother could be seen flying in and out of the chapel conveying food for her offspring.

Protestant Weddings in Manila

Two Protestant weddings have occurred among natives in Manila. Freedom, an American paper in Luzon, which has received mention in our columns, gives a detailed account of the second marriage, and says that they are "the first where natives have sought a Protestant minister to perform the ceremony; and are, doubtless, the first in three hundred years where natives have been married without the consent and knowledge of the local priesthood." The bride, Ponciana Seljo, just like any good American bride, "was dressed in white, including veil." Pasqual Cacaan, the groom, entered "the employ of Company G, First Californians, last October; has been a loyal member of the company and has taken a place on the firing line." Chaplain Pierce performed the ceremony at the residence of Chaplain Fleming of the Colorados. The costly marriage fees imposed during Spanish rule have not been productive of a high moral tone in the social life of the Philippines; and these first Protestant marriages are prophecies, we believe, of better things for the Filipinos.

Children in the Streets

"People should not allow babies to run about the street. If they are run over parents have only themselves to blame." Thus spoke Magistrate Deuel in discharging a driver whose horse, going at a walk, maimed a two-year-old baby, which the driver could not possibly have seen. A New York daily commenting, said: "These words seem harsh, yet they are merely the frank expression of a harsh truth. The streets of a city are no safe places for children. Then what shall be done with the city children? There are practically no playgrounds for them. It is cruelty to keep them shut up in stuffy tenement rooms. And all the grown persons, and even the half grown of a tenement family, must work. Let us have more and more playgrounds on the tops of the school-houses, the piers and the tenements." This incident and comment will emphasize the practical value of the beautiful work in which our readers cooperate with us every summer by sending little tenement waifs to the country, where they have loving oversight and Christian influence, and where their playgrounds are daisied fields and wooded hills. There is another danger of the streets which Christianity must never forget until it is swept away—the danger of the saloon on every corner. In the very doorways of barrooms little children play. This danger exists in every large city in the world.

First Trousers

"O, what a funny little froggie!" Freddie, four years old, was in experimental trousers and blouse, feeling "just like papa," and most important. He burst into tears at Susie's remark and said angrily: "I'd ravver be a frog dan a dirl!" upon which Susie felt aggrieved. Mamma, smoothing matters over, took occasion, while giving Susie some kindly hints, as to tactful treatment of her brother, to impress upon Fred that one way of proving himself worthy of manly garments, was to be very respectful and considerate of people who wore dresses "like mamma and sister."

School for Parents

SCHOOLS for children, artists, doctors, lawyers, teachers, mechanics, engineers — schools for teaching every art and science under the sun—but never until this summer a "School for Parents." Such a school, under the guidance of Dr. Luther Gulick, with Miss Mary Louisa Butler as secretary, was a July feature of the Chautauqua course of lectures. In its announcement of the school, the Chautauqua Assembly Herald explained its object as that of [illegible]

That scientific study to the home and its problems which has shed so much light in other directions. The home is worthy of the best study that can be given to it.

Dr. Gulick, in his opening address, adds:

Its object is to get fathers and mothers together to take up definite topics year after year, and to go to the bottom of these, exhausting all literature upon them and appealing [illegible] and in so far as is possible adding to the knowledge that shall make the world better.

Some of the problems which he suggested, not only for the school, but for the study and observation of all parents, were:

[illegible] important one, since our food makes our bodies; financial relations and [illegible] husband and wife; household hygiene in all its branches and in its relation to moral and spiritual life; "How to [illegible] willed and at the same time nervous and emotional; "How to teach the child to love to stay at home instead of seeking outside amusements, interests and friends;" "How to keep a child's mind pure and free from all desire to read or hear anything coarse or impure;" "How to deal with the subject of children's secrets, and yet, of course, not invade that which is most sacred to all, personality. Children can be forced to tell and so lose their self-respect;" "How to control my child's temper;" "How to give an only child the benefit of social life;" "How early shall the child go to church and Sunday School?" "How shall the child form the habit of church going?" "Use of the Bible in the home."

To tell these and kindred subjects, parents are urged to give the same painstaking, patient study, observation and utilization of facts that scientists and business men apply to their fields of labor. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD welcomes the "School for Parents," as it has welcomed the Mother's Congress and every movement which promises aid to parents in the discharge of heavy responsibilities.

A Boy's Accomplishment

The story is told in a Michigan paper of a little office-boy, whose employers chaffing him for a little fun, said: "You are so small; you never can do any business." "Small as I am," said the little man, "I can do something that none of you big men can do." "Ah! what is that?" they asked curiously. "I can keep from swearing," said the little fellow. There were blushes on four manly faces.

A Mission for Sailor-Men

The Seamen's Christian Association in Its New Quarters and Doing Noble Work

IT is now eleven years since the Seamen's Christian Association of New York City was first organized by a godly band of Christian people, who were interested in the welfare of "the toilers of the deep." They had few resources, but their faith was abundant, and it has not been disappointed. Year by year the work has grown, and every year it has won more friends and supporters who had a kindly corner in their hearts for the sailor lads. Lately it became evident that it had outgrown its quarters on Washington street, and a new and more commodious home for the Association was found at No. 399 West street, where its offices, reading and recreation rooms and chapel are now comfortably and permanently established. The new home is a three-story building, the lower floor being devoted to reading, writing and simple recreation for seamen only. The rooms are open daily from 2 P. M. until 10 P. M., and on Sundays from 10 A. M. to 10 P. M. The second floor is intended exclusively for regular Gospel services, which are held every evening, except Saturday, at 8 P. M. And the third floor is utilized as committee-room and business offices.

A SERVICE AT THE SEAMEN'S MISSION, NEW YORK

Wholly unsectarian in its management, all evangelical denominations are represented in the work of the Association. No salaries are paid to any of the officers. During the past year spiritual results have been very satisfactory. The aggregate attendance has been large, the number of seamen exceeding all former records. Many requests have been made by the sailor lads for prayers that they may become better men, and a large number of temperance pledges have been signed. Meals and lodgings have been provided for 119, and 104 situations procured for seamen on board ships. A seaman has only to mention his needs, to ensure aid and encouragement from the Association, through its superintendent, if it is at all possible to render it.

The Gospel in Colombia

Rev. Joseph Norwood, the American Bible Society's missionary in Colombia, writes us explaining that the Gospel tent for which he is now endeavoring to raise funds is not intended for the city of Bucaramanga only, but will be used in towns and cities throughout the Colombian republic, where the missionaries can find no public hall or other suitable place for holding services. He adds that in very many towns there is no other place of public assemblage than the theatre, and that is frequently to expensive for the workers to hire; besides which, many of the smaller theatres belong to Catholics, who refuse to rent them to any one intending to preach the Gospel. Mr. Norwood proposes to have a tent made in three sections, to be carried on mule-back from one town to another, and to be used in all the important centres of the country. He will personally answer all letters of inquiry sent to him at Room 130, Bible House, New York. The following contributions for the Colombian Gospel Tent work are acknowledged by the treasurer of the American Bible Society:

Previously reported, $134.00. Mrs. Jane Schenck, $2.00; John C. Culbert, $10.00; A Friend, Brooklyn, $2.00; D. Thomas, $3.00; Catherine M. and Eliza Freer, $3.00; J. W. Williams, $10.00; total, $184.00

Our Children's Neighbors

"WHO is my neighbor?" the lawyer asked Jesus; Jesus described the Good Samaritan's ministry; and then the lawyer answered his own question by defining the neighbor as one that showeth mercy. Neighbors of our Fresh-Air children are in this State, and they are in California, Canada, Maine, Mississippi, and all intervening territory. They give money, they give clothes, and—best of all—they give their prayers.

In Nyack itself, in the surrounding country and in other towns on the Hudson, our children have many friends who are neighbors in a two-fold sense. Among these friends none have been more faithful than seven big-hearted little girls, whose names are Natalie, Lucille and Dona Couch, Maud De Pew, Margery Blauvelt, Lillian Van Houten and Janet Voorhis. Last year they made $26 for our fresh-air work; the year before, $27; the present year, $38.82. Janet's mamma lent her lawn to the little girls a few weeks ago; they set forth small tables thereon, with useful and pretty articles for sale. Friends patronized them generously, and they raised the offering mentioned. Living near the Home, they have the pleasure each year of seeing the good accomplished by their labors. Friends of the work living in other States and visiting New York will always be welcome callers at the Home. We wish that every friend of the Home could see the beautiful work done there. The following extracts from many letters show how widely distributed; and how prayerful and generous our children's neighbors are:

Rena, Valdosta, Ga., $3. Wish I could keep a child at the Home all summer. Little Jesse Steele, Chillicothe, O., $3. My allowance to the Fair. I know Jesus would wish I do this (this is in big printed letters). — E. W. McP., Pasadena, Cal., $20, with the giver's prayer. —H. R. G., Columbus, Miss., $5. To the dear little children who know nothing of green fields.—L. A. B., White Oak, Can., $3. God bless the children.—Wilhelmina A., Colorado, $6. Wish I could give one hundred children an outing.

The Church Missionary Society has appealed to Lord Kitchener to remove the restrictions to missionary work in Khartoum. He replied that in a short time Europeans would be permitted to enter the city and stay as long as they chose, and there would of course be no discrimination against missionaries.

Husbands and Wives

AMELIA E. BARR

THE first step in married life is renunciation, and this step is mainly to be taken by the wife. She must give up with a good grace the exaggeration and romance of love-making, and accept in its place that higher tenderness which is the repose of passion, and which springs from the tranquil depths of a man's best nature. This is the first necessity towards making a happy home. Husbands are necessarily under some amount of bondage in their business relations; their interests compel them to look pleasant under all circumstances, to offend no one, and to say no hasty words. Therefore, when they reach their own firesides they have a right to be absolved from this strain, to be at ease and to have no fear of offending tender sensibilities by forgetting some outward and visible token of devotion.

An ancient philosopher said "that a man finds himself seven years older on the day of his marriage;" and the revolution in a woman's feelings and ideas is doubtless still more remarkable. For women have fewer distractions than men have, and many hold very impracticable views or even no views at all about the life they are entering. Those who are naturally weak, expect married life to be a lasting picnic: and when they find it a prosaic reality, are stunned and helpless. Stronger women soon grasp the fact that marriage is not the goal but the starting-point of a journey, that will require from them many virtues which they have not hitherto practiced.

Now this transition period is the crucial point in two lives, and the young wife and husband cannot be too careful in passing it. It must, however, as before said, mainly depend upon the wife. She it is, who at this hour, must decide whether their happiness is to be placed on a surer foundation than ever: or whether, in her folly and selfishness, she will make shipwreck of it. For nothing is more certain than the impossibility of keeping life very long—even in affairs of love—at high pressure. When men and women are lovers, it is permissable for them to think as lovers and to speak as lovers; but when they become husbands and wives they enter a new condition, accept new responsibilities, and the old, fond, foolish romance and exaggeration must give place to that steady, sensible affection, which springs from a mutual confidence in each other's loyalty.

A man, after the enthusiasm of courtship is over, wants to feel in his home at perfect ease; he expects, there at least, to be understood, and to throw aside all the restraints and formalities of business and social life: and a wise wife will accept cheerfully this quiet and secure affection as the best part of marriage. She will realize that her husband must now put work before pleasure, and ambition before romance: that by the very act of making her his wife, he has told her in the most emphatic manner that he loves her: and she will be satisfied with his life of tender truth, and not feel shorn of half her glory and all her rights if he prefers, after a hard day's work, his pipe in the warm library to a stroll with her in the moonlight.

A FOOLISH wife will fret and refuse to believe in the continuance of a love which is not constantly paraded before her eyes. What kind of a home has a husband who must step upon egg shells there, for fear he wound the feelings of a woman who will take nothing on trust; who insists, as children insist, on repeated assurances of affection; who wants him always at her feet, and who is jealous of everything, even of his work? Most husbands suffer, and especially at this period, from the exclusiveness of their wives. They want his whole admiration and sympathy. They are not content with their rights as a wife; they would usurp all the affections of his past life and all the interest of his future. They call this tyranny "love;" it is really a jealous exclusiveness which cannot endure that any other person should share in the pleasure and the affection of their life.

Then begin those miserable poutings and frettings and quarrels and reconciliations which wear and tear love into shreds and patches. The husband's soul is harrassed with stupid jealousies and senseless caprices; for a woman with a small mind has usually a very sharp temper and a very piercing tongue. Not only the patriarch of Idumea and the philosopher of Greece had such wives; the race of Xantippes did not die with the decay of Athenium greatness; and all men have not the grace of John Wesley to bear with a noble "not caring" this experience; weaker men, when they find their homesteads turned into purgatories, keep away from them. Fortunately the number of large-hearted wives and manly, sensible husbands, is immensely in excess—men and women who find their best happiness in increasing the happiness of others: no petty jealousies, no narrow exclusiveness shackle their affections. They do not feel it necessary to fling their house door open to the street: but their hearth is an altar to love and friendship, not an adytum, from which all outside affections and friendships are excluded.

THERE is another fault of this transitional period, which cannot be passed by—it is the one at the opposite pole, a foolish public display of affection that is very ridiculous and annoying to the outside world—little familiarities of touch, half-concealed caresses, absurd pet-names, lover-like attentions, which are flung in the face of the public, to come and admire a happiness they cannot emulate. All of us have seen married couples, who make this parade of their love, and who think themselves objects of envy, when they are really food for ridicule and laughter. Besides, a husband of this kind—though prodigal of expressions of love in company—is generally at his own fireside a very dumb dog; for this is the sort of affection that finds earth's daily food tasteless, and which therefore lives upon demonstrative drams. The truest and fondest married love never indulges in any sloppy effusiveness: it relies on its own sincerity and depth, and the best men and women so understand and accept it.

There never has been a time in the world's history when the influence of a wife over her husband was so important, so general, so particular, so legitimate. Even John Knox, who thought any power in the hands of women, "monstrous," would, if he lived now, undoubtedly prove an estimable and appreciative husband. How women have gained such access of influence it is unnecessary to investigate: that they have gained it is one of those established facts which men have accepted with grace and wisdom. Certainly, they have not become dominant by mere physical superiority. The Scotch collier's wife, who whipped her husband "for his good," has few followers, even among the working classes, where "the missis" is generally an important and authoritative person. The number of women who rule by their intellectual power is exceedingly small. Fools are afraid of clever women, and do not, except in brilliant exceptions, marry them: though clever husbands with clever wives can always make a satisfactory resistance. For if she lectures, he can preach: or if she writes poetry and novels, he can save himself by some philosophical pamphlet or scientific review.

THE secret of domestic government is not such an open one as this. But if a man finds himself "managed" by an admirable wife, he may assure himself that the management has only been acquired by infinite tact and patience and by arts as various as the sex. Unscrupulous women discover their husband's weak or raw points, and keep him tractable by making him wince. Or they assume that calm, deprecating air which says: "It is too bad that such a delicate porcelain vessel as I should have to go down stream with a rough, iron pot like you. But you cannot help your deficiencies, your dull commonplaces, your small aspirations, you are after all a good kind of fellow." He is made to feel that she puts in a constant plea of extenuating circumstances, and that a verdict of inferiority is fully recorded against him. No man can resist such a course of treatment: it will tell upon the firmest will. "Time and I," said Philip of Spain, "against any two." No wonder that a husband standing alone is beaten by "Time and his Wife."

THE power of ninety-nine women out of a hundred is the power of listening, of brightening at the proper moment, of laughing at the right joke, of knowing the exact temper at which a man may be "wrought to purpose," and when he must be let alone. If there is any greater power, it is silence. This force is supreme in the hour of revolt. Can any husband persuade a wife who will not argue with him, who simply opposes to his talk a discouraging silence, and whose whole manner says, "I do not oppose you, it is not my place to do so; but I know I am right"? In spite of his sense and his reason he feels like a bully and a coward; and then, if he makes apologies—which he is almost sure to do—her excuses still further abase him. "Of course he can't uuderstand her. She does not expect it. He does his best," &c., &c. It is easy to see who must have the mastery in such a contest.

Now, a truly noble wife rules by a far finer instinct. She reads her husband's character, not as a means of strengthening her own position, but to guard his self-respect and happiness. By her wonderful tact she saves him from a thousand blunders. She prevents his making many an enemy. This one thing is sure, a good man may safely trust in a good wife. Women have generally a fair allowance of intelligence. It is to be presumed that the parable of the Ten Talents does not refer exclusively to men: and though feminine rule is full of little wisdoms and precautions, it is, upon the whole, far better for a man than the advice of the half-dozen reasonable fellows, which before his marriage gave him the bias of his words and deeds, the drift of his opinions, and the trend of his likes and his dislikes.

The Leaven and the Meal

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Aug. 20

Matt. 13: 33; Dan. 2: 31 35, 45

OPINIONS differ radically as to the meaning of the Parable of the Leaven and the Meal. Eminent comentators have pointed out that the leaven is in the Bible, uniformly employed as a type of evil and corruption. They remind us that at the Passover, the most sacred of all the Jewish festivals, there had to be a minute search to insure the exclusion of leaven from every abode. Dealing then, with the parable on this basis, it is taken as implying that the whole world will become corrupt, and that evil will continue to spread, until the time when Christ shall come in judgment to take vengeance on his enemies. To the ordinary reader, however, this interpretation appears forced, and contrary to the Lord's usual simple method of teaching. Neither is it in harmony with the context. Christ was showing how great may be the results that come from a very small beginning. The tiny mustard-seed becomes a plant so large that the birds of the air lodge in the branches, and a little leaven transforms three measures of meal. In that, it is, as Christ says, like the kingdom of heaven, that kingdom which Daniel saw as a stone filling all the earth.

Taking, then, the plain and obvious meaning of the parable instead of the more profound, as it is generally safe to do with all Christ's teaching, we have a striking type of the progress of the kingdom in the individual and in the world. No special meaning attaches to the three measures, nor to the fact that the work was done by a woman. It is simply an ordinary household act performed by the person who would naturally do it. She takes the usual quantity of meal for a baking and puts in the leaven. There is no need for further interference. Noiselessly and unseen the leaven does its work, and by and by the whole mass has been transformed by this powerful agent. But it is worthy of notice that the leaven is put in from the outside. Human nature does not transform itself. The meal is dead and will remain dead until the agent of the process is introduced. It may be only a word, a thought, the recognition of a principle, but it spreads, it changes this and that; it touches this habit, neutralizes that appetite, affects the man's thoughts and desires and ambitions, changes his disposition, gives him new hopes and aims, and so controls his inner and outward life that he becomes a new man, becomes of the same nature as the leaven that was put in him. Then he becomes leaven, and his influence is felt in every circle in which he mingles. He leavens others. The mysterious influence reaches to his family and friends, and so the transforming process extends its operations.

The history of the Church shows how true was this idea of its divine Founder. Neither the king nor the legislator has ever helped in the propagation of the faith. Both have tried, but neither has done anything but hinder. Nations are never converted in the mass, and never by force. The power goes from one to another, the one leavened particle affecting the unleavened particles nearest to it, and they in their turn become leaven, affecting other particles, the Holy Spirit using diverse means of propagation. Sometimes we have wondered that an unlettered preacher, with no gifts of oratory, has been able to win thousands. Again, it is a learned, gifted orator who moves men. Or instruments that seem singularly adapted for the work fail in it. We wonder in what the difference consists. The parable explains it. Only the leavened particle can affect the unleavened, with which it is in contact. But if there is leaven in any family or community, there will be results. When Christ left the world all the Christians in it could be accommodated in one room. The little company of one hundred and twenty seemed insignificant in comparison with the population of the world. And, like the leaven, they were hidden. Secular historians contemporary with them do not mention them and probably did not know of their existence; yet, without wealth, without prestige, without social influence, the company grew. They died, but those whom they had leavened spread the influence, and so the circle widened, until at this day more than four hundred millions call themselves by the name of Christ. If all these were really leavened, if they had become leaven, how long would we have to wait before all the world was leavened? A still more pertinent question is: What must we infer as to our own personal condition, if among our own friends and associates there are none who are being leavened?

An Aged Rabbi's Need

CASES of concealed poverty are among the saddest. Usually, they are the worthiest. Men and women who have served the world faithfully in their youth, and who, through undeserved misfortune, have fallen upon hard times, who are too old to work and too honestly proud to beg, represent next to infancy itself the most helpless need. It has been the privilege of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers who cooperate with it through contributions for "any good cause" to minister to the wants of many aged, sick and helpless ones, whose poverty was hid from the world.

The history of the aged Rabbi, from whom the subjoined letter, signed in Hebrew, has just been received, is illustrative of many cases of silent suffering and undeserved poverty. It is addressed to the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and says:

There is not enough pen and ink to thank you for what you have done for me and my poor wife. May the Lord reward you for it. You have fulfilled to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. Your representative examined into our need, filled our empty larder with necessaries, paid our rent for three months' in advance, gave us some ready money, and promised further assistance. The rent was due next week; we had no money to meet it. We had been nearly starving. God has sent his angels to us, who are old and poor and cannot help ourselves, even as he sent the ravens to Elijah, his prophet.

HENRY BERNSTEIN,
128 Graham Ave., Brooklyn.

The attention of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was called to the Rabbi's need by a short article in the New York Sun. The Rabbi is over seventy, and has held positions of public trust in his youth and middle age; he is a scholar, speaking and writing nine languages. The aged wife was sick. When well, she contrived to make a few cents a day peddling chickens. The only delicacies for the sick that the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD saw was a tiny piece of ice and a bottle of water lying on it. Our readers will be glad to know that before night these aged ones had a supply of ice, tea, coffee, sugar, bread and butter, and a small sum of money to buy soup and milk with for days to come. Next day, when the rent receipt was handed to him, the old man, looking at the visitor, said wistfully: "God has remembered me. Last night I lay awake with gladness and wonder. One thing I cannot make out. I thought over it last night. Did the Father send you or the Son?" The visitor laid a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on his table. He looked at it, lifted tear-wet eyes, and said: "The Son sent you."

It usually hatches in May, but may be hatched at almost any season, provided the requisite temperature is maintained. An expert, writing on the subject, estimates that when the worm begins to weave the cocoon the filament issues from it at the rate of five or six inches per minute, an average cocoon requiring from three to five days to complete. Ten or twelve pounds of leaves consumed by the worms produce one pound of cocoons and three and three-quarter pounds of cocoons

H. P. M., Toledo, Ill. Did Joseph and Mary take [illegible] states, or did they go to Jerusalem, as per Luke? I would like an explanation of those two chapters.

There is no discrepancy. After the birth of Jesus, the parents remained at Bethlehem until the time arrived for presenting the Babe in the Temple, being the end of the days of purification. After the presentation, Joseph and Mary with the child went to Nazareth, adjusted their affairs and returned to Bethlelonger in a stable but in "a house"—when the incident of the Magis' visit occurred. These wise men had first gone to Jerusalem, whence they were directed to Bethlehem. After their visit Joseph was warned by an angelic messenger and the flight into Egypt followed. To get a clear idea of the order of events, the records of the four evangelists must be taken as a whole, as one records incidents which another omits. Thus Mark and John contain nothing relative to the childhood of Jesus, while Matthew and Luke taken together, give a clear outline of these events, though Luke omits all reference to the return to Bethlehem and the journey into Egypt, the latter of which Matthew relates with considerable detail. In no sense did any one of the four evangelists intend to present a complete chronological record of the Saviour's earthly life, but each designed rather to supplement what the others had written.

Frank A. Brown, Laurel, Md., writes in reply to the strictures of Mrs. Wallace and others on the country schools. He has taught school all his life and writes from experience. [illegible]

If some of the writers who are inveighing against our modern schools would visit some of the public schools in the country districts or the country towns they would doubtless be sadly disappointed at the very small number of thin pale faces among the pupils. . . . The causes of debility in the students of our public schools are usually not because of their school work, but in spite of it.

He enumerates too much reading of books and magazines during hours that should be devoted to recreation or sleep, pampered appetites and a general neglect of home hygiene as among the most prevalent causes of debility among children of the school age.

1. We do not know. It is possible that Nebuchadnezzar, knowing that Daniel would not worship the image, and not wishing to lose so useful a servant, who could interpret dreams, arranged to have him absent by sending him on a mission to some distant part of the kingdom, or permitted him to remain at home. You may be quite sure he was not among the worshippers. 2. Believers in Christ. It is a command of Christ (see John 15: 17). It is perfectly logical. If religion was to be the important thing it is represented as being, the persons who are one with us in it should be very dear to us. They are in the closest of all relationships. 3. It is an objectionable mode of raising money. If the obligations of church-membership were properly realized there would be no need to resort to it. It is better than being in debt, and that is all that can be said in its favor.

It is the duty of a pastor to acquaint himself with the spiritual condition of his congregation, individually and collectively. His method of doing this, however, may be of his own selection. He should endeavor to impress them with the importance of confessing Christ. As to the genuineness of a conversion, it is not always easy to judge quickly, since many

NATIVE CHILDREN OF MISS MARY SHARP'S MISSION, MONROVIA, LIBERIA

Many readers of this journal already know of Miss Sharp's missionary work in the West African Republic. This brave, young American woman many years ago consecrated her life to the service of the Master in the "Dark Continent," and her labors have been greatly blessed. She is one of the most successful teachers in the field and hundreds of little Kroo boys and girls have been educated and brought to Christ through her efforts. Miss Drane, an experienced teacher in the public schools of New York, answers this question as follows:

I should think, if a child were "willing and obedient," and showed such aptitude in mastering [illegible] manner interesting to her. Try this method: Begin by teaching names of objects familiar to the child—for proceeding from known to unknown is the true order of teaching. Remember, that neither a spoken word nor a printed word means anything which that child already knows. Whole words are first learned in conversation. The whole form of the word should be learned first in reading and the first object of the instructor should be to teach the [illegible] which are already known to the ear, without any reference to the analysis into sounds and letters, which belong to a subsequent step.

READING THE BIBLE BY COURSE

[illegible] columns, on July 12, as to the best way of [illegible] them are the following:

Methodical, Brooklyn, N. Y. I have found [illegible] in a year is that described by "A Reader" in [illegible] however, that my plan is an improvement on his as it covers the whole Bible in a year with [illegible] ters a day and six on Sundays. There are 1,189 chapters in all in the whole Bible, and I divide these into four portions in order that my daily reading may be diversified. First, I take the 150 Psalms, and reserve them for my Sunday reading, three every Sunday, which allows an extra Sunday or two for the 119th Psalm. That leaves 1,039 chapters which are easily covered by three chapters a day, including Sundays, the three Psalms before mentioned being additional to the regular reading. The next division is the New Testament 260 chapters. As that does not furnish a chapter for each day I add Deuteronomy and Job to that division, which brings the number up to 336. The next division begins with Genesis and ends with II. Chronicles, omitting Deuteronomy and Ruth, and contains exactly 365 chapters, one for every day in the year. The last division contains 338 chapters, being the remainder of the Old Testament, including Ruth but omitting Deuteronomy and Job, which are in the New [illegible] a division by themselves. My daily reading consists of a chapter from each of the three divisions and on Sunday three Psalms in addition, and, as you will see, I thus cover the whole Bible in less than a year. The daily reading thus laid out is more interesting than six or seven chapters straight ahead.

M. H. F., [illegible], Va., writes: I have been a reader of the Bible since my earliest recollection, and since my marriage in 1858 have read it through several times in our family devotions. It has been my habit to read at them one chapter in course. This was interrupted only during the year I was away from home in the Union army. This would make about thirteen times that I have read the Bible through [illegible] a general view of the whole book and found it very profitable, especially in my Sunday School work. I have been a Sunday School superintendent at different times for about twenty years, and I can affirm that nothing helped me so much as my Bible-reading, and I recommend it to every one.

Rev. E. A. Goddard, Northboro, sends a monthly calendar which [illegible] follows: January: Genesis, Exodus, Ruth, Lamentation and Haggai. [illegible] and Joel. March: Judges, Samuel, Nehemiah and Ecclesiastes. April: Deuteronomy, Kings, Nahum and Zechariah. May: Chronicles, Canticles and Matthew. June: Ezra, Esther, Job, Proverbs, Obadiah and Jonah. July: Psalms from 1 to 101. August: Psalms 102 to 150, Ezekiel, Habakkuk and Jude. September: Isaiah, Luke, Philemon and Micah. October: Jeremiah, Daniel, Mark, Romans and James. November: John, Hosea, Amos, Malachi, Acts and Revelation. December: Zephaniah and all the Epistles not previously read. This system, reading on eight days of the month four chapters, and on the other days of the month three chapters, covers the Bible in a year.

Mr. Roberts Stevenson, Philadelphia, sends a different arrangement, also by months, which he has followed with much benefit since 1881. It averages about seventy-five verses a day, one-half in the morning and the other half in the evening. His arrangement [illegible] cles, II. Kings, Jonah, Amos, Hosea and Chronicles to chapter 17. February—II. Chronicles 18 to 36, Joel, Isaiah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah and Jere- [illegible] 52. Lamentations, John, Peter and Daniel. [illegible] Malachi, Jude. May—Corinthians, Thessalonians, Philemon, Colossians, Ephesians, Philippians, Timothy, Titus and Revelation. [illegible] and Mark. August—Exodus, Leviticus, Romans and the Epistles of John. September—Numbers, Deuteronomy, Galatians, Hebrews and James. October—Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Matthew and Samuel to chapter 14. November—I. Samuel 15 to end of second book of Samuel and Psalms 1 to 118. December—Psalms 119 to 150, I. Kings, Proverbs and Luke.

J. B. Turroughs, Middletown, N. Y., writes that he has read the Bible through by course more than twenty times. He has kept a close record of the time he has spent in Bible reading, and finds that the entire book can be read from cover to cover in one hundred hours.

How Two Sailors, Converted in New York, Have Set on Foot a Religious Movement which is Becoming National in Extent

LUTHERAN CHURCH AT HELSINGFORS

RELIGIOUS work which has special claims on American sympathy is being vigorously prosecuted in Finland, that north-western section of the Czar's unwieldy empire which is just now passing through a political ordeal. It appears that the religious movement, which is spreading rapidly through the country, had its origin in the visit of two young Finnish sailors to this country some thirty-three years ago. Their names were Wilhelm and Gustav Barnlund. During their stay on this side they attended services on board the Bethel ship, John Wesley, at which both were converted. Returning to Kristinestad they began to tell their friends of the joys of salvation. Immediately opposition was aroused. The prejudices of all sects were excited, mobs gathered, the lives of the two young men were threatened and they were finally arrested and taken before a magistrate. But persecution could not silence the enthusiastic young converts. They continued to speak and testify of what God had done in their own souls. They were no preachers, but they gave personal testimony, and as has been the invariable rule, God owned and blessed it. Converts multiplied and at length, feeling the need of help, Gustav Barnlund sent an urgent request for a preacher to the Swedish Methodist Conference. No regular response was made to his appeal, but one of the members of the Conference, a preacher named Lindborg, was so touched by the Macedonian cry, that at his own cost he traveled to Finland to do what he could for the work. He landed in Nikolaestad without money and without friends. Kristinestad was sixty miles away, but Lindborg was a man not easily daunted by obstacles; he set out to walk thither and arrived safely. He received a cordial welcome from the young sailor preachers. Unhappily Lindborg could not speak the language of the people, but there were a few who understood Swedish and from these an interpreter was found. He went from house to house, addressed meetings, and, as in Apostolic times, "taught the way of the Lord more perfectly." He saw enough of the condition of the people to be convinced that the door was open for effectual work and he sent back to the Swedish Conference an earnest appeal for help. His report so impressed the Conference that a regular minister, Gustav Wagnsson by name, was duly commissioned to go as a missionary to Finland. Two years later—in 1885—Elder Bengt A. Carlson followed and began work in Helsingfors, the capital of Finland. A little preaching hall was hired there which was crowded at every service. Still, the Swedish preachers were hampered by their ignorance of the language which is spoken by seven-eighths of the people, and it is simply marvelous that the movement they inaugurated under so much difficulty should have been so successful. It speaks volumes for the spirit of the people and for the energy and devotedness of its two young sailor leaders that results so large should have followed the preaching of the Gospel.

In 1887, to the joy of all the converts, a Finnish preacher, who could give them the Gospel in their own tongue, was secured, and since that time the work has gone forward with redoubled vigor. During the following four years the number of preachers grew to seven, and the Gospel had been preached in eleven of the thirty-seven large towns of the country. The news of the movement spread to the other towns, and invitations speedily flowed in. They were accepted so far as was possible. More preachers were secured, and now Methodism seems to be well established in the country. There are one thousand regular communicants, sixteen ordained preachers and twenty flourishing Sunday Schools, containing fifteen hundred children, and eighty teachers. An effort is now being made to build a Methodist church in Helsingfors, to replace the little hired building which has become too small for the crowds who come to listen to the Gospel. The Finnish people are poor, but out of their own resources they have given sufficient to purchase a site for their church. Recently Mrs. Frances L. Parker has made a missionary journey on their behalf to London and across the Atlantic to New York, to tell of the wonderful work already accomplished and to obtain funds to erect the church.

It must not be supposed from this recital that Finland is a heathen country. It has a regularly established Christian ministry, and the Lutheran faith is recognized throughout the land as the national religion. But as England was, when Wesley and Whitefield began to preach, so Finland had sunk into religious lethargy. The pastors did their duty perfunctorily, and the people knew nothing of personal, vital religion. As a consequence, the vice of drunkeness, to which the Finns are proverbially addicted, increased. Especially in the districts adjoining the Russian states, the people were rapidly deteriorating, when the two young sailors carried back from New York the seed of Gospel truth, which has received so rich a blessing.

The population of Finland is about two and a half millions. They have hitherto enjoyed a degree of self-government exceptional in Russia. The Finnish language has been used in the courts and they had excellent educational facilities. Helsingfors, the capital, has a fine university and there are high-grade schools there and in the smaller towns. There apears to have been little effort made to Russianize the country until recently, but now some ill-advised counsellor of the Czar has persuaded him to inaugurate a policy which has stirred the patriots of Finland almost to the verge of revolution. The particular "turn of the screw" which has given the most pain, is that of conscription. The Finns were liable to army service but it was only in the Finnish army for the defence of their own land and the army was commanded by Finnish officers. Under the proposed change, the Finnish conscript is to serve in the Russian army and may be sent to any part of the Empire and, worse than all, Russian officers will command the Finnish army. The number of young men who must do military service has hitherto been 1,920, who have been annually selected by ballot to serve for three years and afterward to be in the reserve corps for two years. The new military scheme proposes to take 7,200 young men every year, to keep them in active service five years and afterwards put them in the reserve for thirteen years. It is this scheme which has agitated all Finland and is likely to lead to wholesale emigration of young men. Efforts are being made to induce the Czar to reconsider the objectionable scheme, but at present without much prospect of success.

The Yellow Fever Outbreak

THE Old Soldiers' Home at Hampton, Va., has been visited by an epidemic of yellow fever, the origin of which had not been discovered, at latest accounts. It is believed, however, that the infection may have come from the village of Phoebus, which is just outside of the Home, and where several cases have appeared, two of them being old soldiers who have been removed to the Home hospital inside the grounds. Within the Home itself, some forty cases in all have developed, and ten have died. A full corps of physicians is in attendance. Major Vickery is in charge of the Home hospital staff. The Soldiers' Home is for the time being quarantined, and so also is the village of Phoebus. A wagon service takes the mail to the "dead line" at the quarantine boundary, and there another wagon takes the pouches to Hampton. All farmers are shut out, and the utmost precautions are taken in supplying provisions, fuel, etc., so that the infection may not spread. Several hundred citizens have volunteered their services as quarantine guards, and are doing duty, armed with rifles and shotguns. The fever scare has also spread to Newport News, and a large number of people have left the city, including over 700 workmen from the shipbuilding yards. Many devices are resorted to by visiting Norfolk people to escape from the peninsula.

Skilled physicians from other cities including New York, have gone on to Hampton to aid the local staff in fighting the fever. Gen. Conklin, who is at the head of the various Soldiers' Homes, issued a request for medical aid at Hampton which met with a hearty and spontaneous response, proving once more the heroism of the medical fraternity in such emergencies. The War Department has ordered the issuance of tents for camping on the Home grounds. There is no evidence that the infection has spread beyond the Home and the adjacent village. In order, however, to lessen the danger, all soldiers who have gone from Hampton recently, are being isolated wherever they happen to be located.

The War Department, desiring to avoid the spread of the disease at Hampton, is arranging to remove the Fourth Artillery from Fort Monroe. There is no fever at old Point Comfort. It is now hoped that the infection will not cross the water between the peninsula and Norfolk. Quarantine measures have been adopted by the various seaports and railroad centers against all the infected points and the utmost care is taken to prevent the disease getting a foothold outside of the afflicted locality where it now prevails.

Our photographs on the first page of this issue include an excellent view of the Soldiers' Home, the Home Hospital now filled with the fever-stricken veterans; also the Governor's residence, and the staff who have charge of the Home at this time of great trial. The latter have the cordial sympathy of God's people throughout the Union, and their earnest prayers for the subsidence of the epidemic.

To step out of self-life into Christ-life; to lie still and let him lift you out of it; to fold your hands close and hide your face upon the hem of his robe; to let him lay his cooling, soothing hands upon your soul, and draw all the hurry and fever from its veins; to realize that you are not a mighty messenger, and important worker of his, full of care and responsibility, but only a little child with a Father's gentle bidding to heed and fulfill; to lay your busy plans and ambitions confidently in his hands, as the child brings its broken toys at its mother's call; to serve him by waiting; to praise him by saying, "Holy, holy, holy," a single note of praise, as do the seraphim of the heavens if that be his will; to cease to hurry so that you lose sight of his face; to learn to follow him and not run ahead of orders; to cease to live in self, but to live in him and for him; to love his honor more than your own; to be a clear and facial medium for his life-tide to shine and [illegible]

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

. . . Epidemic of Strikes . . .

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, I. Cor. 12: 21. . . . The eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee

EVERYTHING standing still in Chicago ceasing work in one day; Brooklyn stunned by the attempt to halt its railroad cars; Cleveland in the throes of a labor agitation, and restlessness among toilers all over the land have caused an epidemic of strikes, and somewhat to better things. I apply the Pauline thought of my text.

You have seen an elaborate piece of machinery with a thousand wheels and a thousand bands and a thousand pulleys all controlled by one great water wheel, the machinery so adjusted that when you jar one part of it you jar all parts of it. Well, human society is a great piece of mechanism controlled by one great and ever-revolving force—the wheel of God's providence. You harm one part of the machinery of society and you harm all parts. All professions interdependent. All trades interdependent. All classes of people interdependent. Capital and Labor interdependent. No such thing as independence. Dives cannot kick Lazarus without hurting his own foot. They who threw Shadrach into the furnace got their own bodies scorched. Or to come back to the figure of the text, what a strange thing it would be if the eye should say, I oversee the entire physical mechanism. I despise the other members of the body, if there is anything I am disgusted with, it is with those miserable, low-lived hands. Or, what if the hand should say, I am the boss workman of the whole physical economy; I have no respect for the other members of the body. If there is anything I despise, it is the eye seated under the dome of the forehead doing nothing but look.

I come in and I wave the flag of truce between these two contestants, and I say: "The eye cannot say to the hand, 'I have no need of thee.'"

That brings me to the first suggestion, and that is, that Labor and Capital are to be brought to a better understanding by a complete canvass of the whole subject. They will be brought to peace when they find that they are identical in their interests. When one goes down, they both go down. When one rises, they both rise. There will be an equilibrium after awhile. There never has been an exception to the rule. That which is good for one class of society eventually will be good for all classes of society, and that which is bad for one class of society will eventually and in time be bad for all. Every speech that Labor makes against Capital postpones the day of permanent adjustment. Every speech that Capital makes against Labor postpones the day of permanent adjustment. When Capital maligns Labor, it is the eye cursing the hand. When Labor maligns Capital, it is the hand cursing the eye. As far as I have observed, the vast majority of capitalists are successful laborers. If the capitalists would draw their glove, you would see the broken finger nail, the scar of an old blister, the stiffened finger joint. The great publishers of the country for the most part were book-binders, or typesetters, on small pay. The great carriage manufacturers for the most part sandpapered wagon bodies in wheelwright shops. While, on the other hand, in all our large manufacturing establishments you will find men on wages who once employed a hundred or five hundred hands. The distance between Capital and Labor is not a great gulf over which is swung a Niagara suspension bridge; it is only a step, and the capitalists are crossing over to become laborers, and the laborers are crossing over to become capitalists. Would God they might shake hands while they cross. On the other hand, laborers are the highest style of capitalists. Where are their investments? In banks. No! In the railroads. No! Their nerve, their muscle, their bone, their mechanical skill, their physical health are magnificent capital. He who has two eyes, two ears, two feet, two hands, ten fingers, has machinery that puts into nothingness carpet and screw and cotton factory, and all the other implements on the planet. The capitalists were laborers, the laborers were capitalists. The sooner we understand that the better.

Again: There is to come relief to the laboring classes of this country through cooperative associations. I am not at this moment speaking of trades unions, but of that plan by which laborers put their surplus together and become their own capitalists. Instead of being dependent upon the beck of this capitalist or that capitalist, they manage their own affairs. In England and Wales there are 813 cooperative associations. They have 340,000 members; they have a capital of $18,000,000, or what corresponds to our dollars, and they do a business annually of $63,000,000. Thomas Brassey, one of the foremost men in the British Parliament on the subject says, "Cooperation is the one and the only relief for the laboring populations. This is the path," he says, "by which they are to come up from the hand-to-the-mouth style of living, to reap the rewards and the honors of our advanced civilization." Lord Derby and John Stuart Mill who gave half their lives to the study of the labor question believed in cooperative institutions. The cooperative institution formed in Troy, N. Y., stood long enough to illustrate the fact that great good might come of such an institution, if it were rightly carried on and mightily developed.

"But," says some one, "haven't these institutions sometimes been a failure?" Yes. Every great movement has been a failure at some time. Application of the steam power a failure, electro-telegraphy a failure, railroading a failure, but now the chief successes of the world

"But," says some one, "why talk of surplus being put by laborers into cooperative associations, when the vast multitude of toilers of this country are struggling for their daily bread, and have no surplus?" I reply: Put into my hand the money spent by the laboring classes of America for rum and tobacco, and I will establish cooperative associations in all parts of this land, some of them mightier than any financial institutions of the country. We spend in this country over $100,000,000 every year for tobacco. We spend over $1,500,000,000 directly or indirectly for rum. The laboring classes spend their share of this money. Now, suppose the laboring man who has been expending his money in those directions, should just add up how much he has expended during these past few years, and then suppose that that money was put into a cooperative association, and then suppose he should have all his friends in toil, who had made the same kind of expenditure, do the same thing, and that should be added up and put into a cooperative association. And then take all that money expended for over-dress and over-style and over-living on the part of toiling people in order that they may appear as well as persons who have more income: gather that all up and you could have cooperative associations all over this land.

I am not saying anything now about trades unions. You want to know what I think of trades unions. I think they are most beneficial in some directions, and they have a specific object, and in this day, when there are vast monopolies a few men, unless the laboring men of this country and all countries band together they will go under. There is a lawful use of a trade union, but then there is an unlawful use of a trade union. If it means sympathy in time of sickness, if it means finding work for people when they are out of work, if it means the improvement of the financial, the moral or the religious condition of the laboring classes, that is all right. Do not artists band together in an art union? Do not singers band together in Handel and Haydn Societies? Do not newspaper men band together in Press Clubs? Do not ministers of religion band together in conferences and associations? There is not in all the land a city where clergymen do not come together, many of them once a week, to talk over affairs. For these reasons you should not blame labor guilds. When they are doing their legitimate work they are most admirable, but when they come around with drum and fife and flag, and drive people off from their toil, from their scaffoldings, from their factories, then they are nihilistic, then they are communistic, then they are barbaric, then they are a curse. If a man wants to stop work let him stop work, but he cannot stop me from work.

But now suppose that all the laboring classes banded together for beneficient purposes in cooperative association, under whatever name they put their means together. Suppose they take the money that they waste in rum and tobacco, and use it for the elevation of their families, for the education of their children, for their moral, intellectual and religious improvement? what a different state of things we would have in this country, and they would have in Great Britain!

Do you not realize the fact that men work better without stimulant? You say, "Will you deny the laboring men this help which they get from strong drink, borne down as they are with many anxieties and exhausting work?" I would deny them nothing that is good for them. I would deny them strong drink, if I had the power, because it is damaging to them. My father said, "I became a temperance man in early life because I found that in the harvest field, while I was naturally weaker than the other men, I could hold out longer than any of them: they took stimulant and I took none."

Everybody knows they cannot endure great fatigue—men who indulge in stimulants. All our young men understand that. When they are preparing for the regatta, or the ball club, or the athletic wrestling, they abstain from strong drink. Now, suppose all this money that is wasted were gathered together and put into cooperative institutions—Oh! we would have a very different state of things from what we have now.

I remark again: The laboring classes of this country are to find great relief when they learn, all of them learn, forecast and providence. Vast numbers of them put down their income and they put down their expenses, and if the income meets the expenses, that is all that is necessary. I know laboring men who are in a perfect fidget until they have spent their last dollar. They fly around everywhere until they get it spent. A case came under my observation where a young man was receiving $700 a year, and earned it by very hard work. The marriage day came. The bride had received $500 as an inheritance from her grandfather. She put the $500 in wedding equipment. Then the twain hired two rooms on the third story. Then this man, who had most arduous employment, just as much as he could possibly endure, got evening employment so he could earn a few dollars more, and by this extra evening employment, almost extinguished his eyesight. Why did he take this extra evening employment? Was it to lay by something for a rainy day? No. Was it to get a life insurance so that if he should die his wife would not be a pauper? No. It was for the one purpose of getting his wife a $150 sealskin sacque. I am just giving you a fact I know. The sister of this woman, although she was a very poor girl, was not to be eclipsed, and so she went to work day and night, and toiled and toiled and toiled almost into the grave until she news went abroad all through the street. Most of the people on that street were laboring, hard-working people, and they were not to be outshone in this way, and they all went to work in the same direction, and practically said, though not literally: "Though the heavens fall we must have a sealskin sacque!"

A clergyman in Iowa told me that his church and the entire neighborhood [illegible] been ruined by the fact that the people mortgaged their farms in order to go down to the Philadelphia Centennial in 1876. First, one family would go, then another family, and finally it was not respectable not to go to the Centennial at Philadelphia, and they mortgaged their farms. The church and the neighborhood ruined in that way. Now, between such fools and pauperism there is only a very short step. In time of peace prepare for war. In time of prosperity prepare for adversity. Yet how many there are who drive on the verge of the precipice, and at the least touch of accident or sickness over they go. Ah! my friends, it is not right, it is not honest. He that provideth not for his own, and especially those of his own household, is worse than an infidel. A man has no right to live in luxury and have all comforts and all brightness around him, taking his family with him at that rate—everything bright and beautiful and luxurious, until he stumbles against a tombstone and falls in, and they all go to the poorhouse. That is not common honesty. I am no advocate of skinflint saving. I abhor it. But I plead for Christian providence. There are some people who are disgusted if they see anything like economy, such as a man might show in turning down the gas in the parlor when he goes out. There are families actually embarrassed if you ring their doorbell before they have the hall lighted. There are people who apologize if you surprise them at the table. Now, it is mean, or it is magnificent to save just according to what you save for. If it is for the miserly hoarding of it, then it is despicable, but if it means better education for your children, if it means more house help for your wife when she is not strong enough to do much work, if it means that the day of your death shall not be a horror beyond all endurance because it is to throw your family into disruption and annihilation and the poorhouse—then it is magnificent, if it is to avoid all that.

Some of the older persons remember very well Abraham Van Nest, of New York, one of its Christian merchants. He was often called mean because he calculated so closely. Why did he calculate closely? That he might have the more to give. There was not a Bible society, or a tract society, or a reformatory institution in the city of New York, but he had his hand in supporting it. He denied himself many luxuries that he might give to others the necessities. He has been many years reaping his reward in heaven: but I shall never forget the day when I, a green country lad, came to his house and spent the evening, and at the close of the evening as I was departing, he accompanied me to the door, accompanied me to the steps, came down off the steps, and said: "Here, De Witt, is $40 for books: don't say anything about it." It is mean or it is magnificent to save, according as you save for a good or for a bad object.

I know there are many people who have much to say against savings banks and life insurances. I have to tell you that the vast majority of the homesteads in this country have been the result of such institutions, and I have to tell you also that the vast majority of the homesteads of the future for the laboring classes will be the result of such institutions. It will be a great day for the working classes of England and the United States when the workingman can buy a barrel of flour, instead of flour by the small sack: when he can buy a barrel of sugar, instead of sugar by the pound: when he can pay cash for coats and hats and shoes, rather than pay an additional amount for the reason that he has to get it all charged.

Again, I remark: Great relief is to come for the laboring classes of this country by appreciation on the part of employers, that they had better take their employees into their confidence. I can see very easily, looking from my standpoint, what is the matter. Employees, seeing the employer in seeming prosperity do not know all the straits, all the hardships, all the losses, all the annoyances. They look at him and they think, "Why, he has it easy, and we have it hard." They do not know that at that very moment the employer is at the last point of desperation to meet his engagements.

I know a gentleman very well who has over a thousand hands in his employ. I said to him some years ago when there was great trouble in the labor market, "How are you getting on with your men?" "O!" he said, "I have no trouble." "Why," I said, "have not you had any strikes?" "O! no," he said, "I never had any trouble." "What plan do you pursue?" He said, "I will tell you. All my men know every year just how matters stand. Every little while I call them together and say, 'Now, boys, last year I made so much—this year I made less; so you see I cannot pay you as much as I did last year. Now, I want to know what you think I ought to have as a percentage out of this establishment, and what wages I ought to give you. You know I put all my energy in this business, put all my fortune in it and risked everything. What do you really think I ought to have and you ought to have?' By the time we come out of that consultation we are unanimous; there has never been an exception. When we prosper, we all prosper together; when we suffer, we all suffer together, and my men would die for me." Now, let all employers be frank with their employees. Take them into your confidence. Let them know just how matters stand. There is an immense amount of common sense in the world. It is always safe to appeal to it.

I remark again: Great relief will come to the laboring classes of this country through the religious rectification of it. Labor is honored and rewarded in proportion as a community is Christianized. Why is it that our smallest coin in this country is a penny, while in China it takes a half-dozen pieces of coin, or a dozen, to make one of our pennies in value, so the Chinese carry the cash, as they call it, like a string of beads around the neck? We never want to pay less than a penny for anything in this country. They must pay that which is worth only the sixth part or the twelfth part of a penny. Heathenism and iniquity and infidelity depress everything. The Gospel of Jesus Christ elevates everything. How do I account for this? I account for it with the plainest philosophy. The religion of Jesus Christ is a democratic religion. It tells the employer that he is a brother to all the operatives in the establishment—made by the same God, to lie in the same dust, and to be saved by the same supreme mercy. It does not make the slightest difference how much money you have, you cannot buy your way into the kingdom of Heaven. If you have the grace of God in your heart, you will enter Heaven. So you see it is a democratic religion. Saturate our populations with this Gospel, and labor will be respectful, labor will be rewarded, labor will be honored, capital will be Christian in all its behavior, and there will be higher tides of thrift set in.

Let me say a word to all capitalists. Be your own executors. Make investments for eternity. Do not be like some of those capitalists I know who walk around among their employees with a supercilious air, or drive up to the factory in a manner which seems to indicate they are the autocrat of the universe, with the sun and moon in their vest pockets, chiefly anxious when they go among laboring men not to be touched by the greasy or smirched hand and have their broadcloth injured. Be a Christian employer. Remember those who are under your charge are bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh; that Jesus Christ died for them and that they are immortal. Divide up your estates, or portions of them, for the relief of the world, before you leave it. Do not go out of the world like that man who died in New York, leaving in his will $40,000,000, yet giving how much for the church of God? how much for the alleviation of human suffering? He gave some money a little while before he died. That was well; but in all this will of $40,000,000 how much? Two cents? No One cent? No. These great cities groaning in anguish, nations crying out for the bread of everlasting life. A man in a will giving forty millions of dollars and not one cent to God. It is a disgrace to our civilization. O! capitalists of the United States, be your own executors. Be a George Peabody, if need be, on a small scale. God has made you a steward—discharge your responsibility.

My word is to all laboring men in this country: I congratulate you at your brightening prospects. I congratulate you on the fact that you are getting your representatives at Albany, at Harrisburg, and at Washington. I have only to mention such a man of the past as Henry Wilson, the shoemaker; as Andrew Johnson, the tailor; as Abraham Lincoln, the boatman. The living illustrations easily occur to you. This will go on until you will have representatives at all the headquarters, and you will have full justice. Mark that. I congratulate you also at the opportunities for your children. I congratulate you that you have to work and that when you are dead your children will have to work.

I congratulate you also on your opportunities of information. Plato paid one thousand three hundred dollars for two books. Jerome ruined himself financially by buying one volume of Origen. What vast opportunities for intelligence for you and your children. A working man goes along by the show window of some great publishing house and he sees a book that costs five dollars. He says, "I wish I could have that information; I wish I could raise five dollars for that costly and beautiful book." A few months pass on and he gets the value of that book for twenty-five cents in a pamphlet. There never was such a day for the workingmen of America as this day and the day that is coming.

I also congratulate you because your work is only prefatory and introductory. You want the grace of Jesus Christ, the Carpenter of Nazareth. He toiled himself, and he knows how to sympathize with all who toil. Get his grace in your heart and you can sing on the scaffolding amid the storm, in the shop shoving the plane, in the mine plunging the crowbar, on shipboard climbing the ratlines. He will make the drops of sweat on your brow glittering pearls for the eternal coronet. Are you tired, he will rest you. Are you cold, he will wrap you in the mantle of his love. Who are they before the throne? "Ah!" you say, "their hands were never calloused with toil." Yes, they were. You say, "Their feet were never blistered with the long journey." Yes, they were; but Christ raised them to that high eminence. Who are these? "These are they that came out of great tribulation and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." That for every Christian working man and for every Christian workingwoman will be the beginning of eternal holiday.

Colombia's Helpless Waifs

The Worse Than Orphan Native Children of the Impoverished South American State

IN Bucaramanga, Colombia, South America, a home for friendless native children is beginning to take form through the motherly labors of Mrs. A. P. Norwood, wife of the Protestant missionary in that place, whose work is already familiar to our readers. The manner in which this work started is a pretty and pathetic story.

Mrs. Norwood has been supporting and teaching a little native lad, Vincente for nearly a year. He now helps her by serving soup to other orphans and indigent sick, generally children. Vincente, may be said in a way to be founder of the home. One day, when Mrs. Norwood went into her kitchen, she found this little fellow there with Julia, the gardener's little daughter, both sitting down on the floor and eating with their fingers, native fashion. He did not get enough to eat at home, but here he was kindly treated and came nearly every day.

Vincente's mother was working with the gardener's wife. One day, she and the child disappeared. On inquiring, Mrs. Norwood found that the mother had been drinking and quarrelsome, and had gone off, taking the child with her and had left him with a poor old couple who lived by begging. The gardener's wife, knowing that he would suffer for food and care, brought him back. Gradually he established himself in the minister's home and at his table, and came to be liked as a real child of the house, claiming its mistress as his "mamma." When his mother came to see him after her release from jail, she did not wish to take him away and Vincente did not wish to go. Soon after Vincente's adoption into this home, an infant girl, whose mother was dying, was taken; then another unfortunate child. By degrees, a number of children began to come every day for a little food and kindly counsel. Scriptural teaching accompanied the relief for their bodies. "Thus," Mrs. Norwood writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "we were led into this work for the poor children of Colombia, and the wish came to us to open a home for children. More little ones apply than we have room or means to take."

In a letter from Bucaramanga, just received, Mrs. Norwood describes the Christian work which the missionaries are doing among the sick poor. There is widespread poverty and great need of a proper medical system. Among the natives, the hospital (which is under Catholic control) is regarded as a place to which people simply go to die. The misery and destitution of the lower classes are indescribable. There are many orphans and also many mothers who are unable to care for their little ones. The whole country is impoverished, and commerce and industry are in a hopeless condition. An American dollar is worth $4.05 Colombian, and in Cartagena $5. In Barranquila, too, there is much suffering and crime is increasing.

"The photograph," Mrs Norwood explains, "is a representation of 'begging day' in Bucaramanga. On Fridays we have a stream of poor all day long; on other days a smaller number come. Each one receives a cuartillo, two and a half cents, and a piece of bread or panela (brown sugar). At noon the door is often crowded with poor people taking soup. As a general thing they prefer soup to money. A soup-house would be a great blessing to the poor and sick. Such a place we wish to establish in connection with a Mission House on the settlement plan. Our hearts are saddened by the sight of so much misery that we cannot relieve because of lack of means. The twin girls beside me in the picture, ought to be in school, but they must be on the street all day seeking help for their sick mother and little brothers. As a general thing they beg in a quiet way, waiting in the doorways until they are noticed. All of this may sound familiar to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers accustomed to the poverty of our large American cities, and they may say, 'we have enough poverty at home,' but let them remember that these people are not Evangelical, Bible-reading Christians. They have not yet received the Gospel in its purity. They are taught to pray to San Antonio, asking the saint for some blessing, and offering in return to give a certain amount for bread for the poor. This money passes through the hands of the priests."

Dr. Norwood has acquired local fame in the successful treatment of chills and fever and has given away a great deal of medicine to poor sufferers, muleteers and others, who are especially exposed to such attacks. It is the intention of Dr. and Mrs. Norwood to found a Mission Home for children, with a soup kitchen and other additions, and this will be a valuable adjunct to their spiritual work. Any reader who is interested in their efforts in this direction may communicate with Dr. Norwood direct, to the care of the American Bible Society, Bible House, New York.

"BEGGING DAY" IN BUCARAMANGA, COLOMBIA

Christ in the Home

There was a young man in the middle West, says Mr. Moody, who had been more or less interested about his soul's salvation. One afternoon, in his office, he said: "I will accept Jesus Christ as my Lord and Saviour." He went home and told his wife, who was a nominal professor of religion, that he had made up his mind to serve Christ, and he added: "After supper to-night I will take the company into the drawing-room and erect the family altar."

"Well," said his wife, "you know some of the gentlemen who are coming to tea are sceptics, and they are older than you are, and don't you think you had better wait until after they have gone, or else go out in the kitchen."

The young man thought for a few moments, and then he said: "I have asked Jesus Christ into my house for the first time, and I shall take him into the best room, and not the kitchen."

So he called his friends into the drawing-room. There was a little sneering, but he read and prayed. That man afterward became Chief Justice of the United States Court.

His Wealth a Sacred Trust

Mr. William Boshart, of Lowville, N. Y., died July 22, 1899, at the residence of his brother with whom he had made his home for some years past. He was born in Lowville seventy-nine years ago. He was one of the oldest members of the Presbyterian Church and was a liberal contributor to its support. He was deeply interested in the spread of the Gospel and made frequent contributions [illegible] TIAN HERALD for that purpose and for other benevolences also. Many in the vicinity of his home have received copies of the Scriptures purchased by him of this journal. He responded liberally to the calls for relief for [illegible] terested in home and foreign missions.

Returning from Captivity

S. S. Lesson for August 27. Ezra 1: 1-11
Golden Text, Ps. 126: 3

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

DANIEL, the prophet, had discovered in the first year of Darius that the time was come for the accomplishment of God's promises to Israel of restoration to their own land, and Daniel took the matter to heart and found time, without being in any way untrue to the duties of his office (Dan. 6: 4), to set his face unto the Lord God "to seek by prayer and supplications, with fasting in sack-cloth and ashes" (Dan. 9: 2, 3). Why did he pray, if he knew that the time was come? Must not the Scripture be fulfilled if God had foretold by Jeremiah that the time of the captivity should be seventy years (Jer. 25: 11, 12; 29: 10)? Daniel knew by "books." He did not confine his attention to one book: the writings of Jeremiah. He studied all the Scripture and knew from the writings of Moses that it was incumbent upon God's people also to "confess their iniquity . . . [that] their uncircumcised hearts be humbled and they then accept the punishment of their iniquity, then [God said] will I remember my covenant and I will remember the land" (Lev. 26: 40–42).

Thus, "in the first year of Cyrus," two years after Daniel's prayers, "that the Word of the Lord, by the mouth of Jeremiah might be accomplished, the Lord stirred up the Spirit of Cyrus, king of Persia." Cyrus had been seen by the prophet Isaiah 174 years before as the executor of God's purposes towards Israel. "For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name: I have surnamed thee though thou hast not known me," is part of the Word spoken in prophecy to Cyrus [illegible] served God's purpose of judgment upon Israel and the surrounding nations (Jer. 27: 1–11), and now Cyrus was raised up for a purpose of mercy; but both kings were only instruments in the hands of God, just as kings and all other earthly powers in our own day, whatever their intention may be, must, voluntarily or involuntarily, serve the purpose of God.

It was not the natural benevolence of the heart of Cyrus, but God's overruling which led Cyrus to make a proclamation which must have caused astonishment among his politicians. Daniel was still living: it is more than possible that Cyrus, as well as his predecessor, Darius, had come under the influence of this prophet of Jehovah, and that this may account for his action. That he had some knowledge of God is clear from the proclamation itself. "Thus saith Cyrus, King of Persia, the Lord God of Heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth: and he hath charged me to build him a house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah." Surely this man who at first did not know God (Isa. 45: 5) had been brought to the knowledge of the truth. May it not be that he was the third mighty king given to the prayers of Daniel?

The proclamation read further: "Who is there among you of all his people? his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, which is in Judah, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel (he is the God), which is in Jerusalem. 'He is the God.'" Nebuchadnezzar had said of the Most High, he "liveth for ever and ever: for his dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom from generation to generation." Darius bore witness of him. "He is the living God and steadfast for ever, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed. . . . He worketh signs and wonders in heaven and in earth, and now Cyrus also bears witness of him! He proclaimed regarding the people of God, whosoever remaineth in any place when he sojourneth, let the men of his place help him with silver and gold, and with goods and with beasts, beside the freewill offering for the house of God which is in Jerusalem."

If Daniel was blest to the king, how much more was he blest among his own people! Doubtless his influence was deeply felt among the captives in Babylon, as was also Ezekiel among those who were by the river Chebar. Thus spiritual life was probably deepening among the people who had been brought into captivity because of their sins, and so they were being prepared for the return to their own land. But it was not all of them who accepted the call of Cyrus. "Then rose up the chief of the fathers of Judah and Benjamin, and the priests and the Levites, with all them whose spirit God had raised, to go up to build the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem." There were undoubtedly many who had got into prosperous business in Babylon, and being unconverted, were quite at home in the wicked and corrupt city, and they had no desire to return to Palestine: the honor of their God and the honor of his Word made no appeal to their hearts.

There is a striking difference between this return from the captivity and the Zionist movement of the present day. In the time of Ezra, the movement was of God. He stirred up Daniel to pray. He stirred up Cyrus to make proclamation to the Jews; he raised up the spirit of his people. It was a movement which had its commencement and outcome in God. Again it was "the chief of the fathers, the priests and the Levites" who were foremost in the work. The Zionist movement, as it is generally understood, is political, not religious; it is man-made not divine: it has not begun by the confession of sin, and the chief of the fathers are not the leaders in the movement. It certainly shows us what may be at hand, and it may be overruled to lead us on to a more complete return of Israel according to the prophecies. In Ezra's time not quite 50,000 Jews returned to their own land. It is a remarkable fact that more than double that number, about 120,000 Jews are now in Palestine, but their first thought is not to build the house of their God. When God's time is come for his children to go forward, everything is easy: nothing can hinder or stand against the accomplishment of his purpose, when his children are on his side. Why is there such a cry for money to do the work of the Lord? Have we not an object lesson in the life and work of the late George Muller? In all those more than sixty years of service, was God ever known to fail him in withholding supplies for that which he had shown his servant to be his will? The same spirit which God had put into the hearts of his own to go forth from Babylon stirred up those who remained to help them. "They that were about them strengthened their hands with vessels of silver, with gold, with goods and with beasts, and with precious things (according to the commandment of the king), besides all that was willingly offered." And this latter could not have been little, or it would not have been thus mentioned. Oh, how precious is the privilege of expecting means for the work of the Lord, not from man, but in direct answers to prayer from God himself though it may come by the hand of man.

The king, too, was not backward. Already he had impoverished himself by commanding that the departing Jews should be assisted; his revenue would be decreased by nearly 50,000 tax payers, but, over and above all this, he gave up, in obedience to a deep sense that God required it of him, and by no request from man, the holy vessels of the house of the Lord which Nebuchadnezzar had brought out of Jerusalem, and "had put them in the house of his gods," and in which the wicked Belshazzar had drunk wine while praising his abominable idols.

MANY romantic stories are told of the birth and early life of Cyrus by ancient historians. Herodotus mentions four, which contradicted one another. All doubts have now, however, been set at rest by the recent discovery of a cylinder and a tablet, both covered with cuneiform inscriptions which have been deciphered. From these it appears that he was king of the small province of Anzan, as his father, Cambyses, was before him. Astyages, King of Persia made war upon him, but the army of Astyages being disaffected, deposed him and handed him a prisoner to Cyrus, who thereupon became king of Persia. A similar revolt enabled him to conquer Babylonia. He thus learned the danger of having under duress large disaffected populations. He did not wish any of his rivals to gain the advantge over him that he had gained over Persia and Babylonia. There were probably two million Hebrews in the Babylonian kingdom, and if in a crisis, when he was attacked by an enemy, they rose up against him, he might be overthrown. It would therefore be a wise policy to allow them to return to their own land, where they would form a barrier against Egypt. Of course, Cyrus did not assign this as his reason. He announced that he had received a command from God: but he was not the first, nor the only man who has concealed his motives under a cloak of obedience to God. Any Hebrews who desired to return to Palestine, were at liberty to do so. And they were not to go empty handed. To other captives, Cyrus returned their images, but as the [illegible] Ezra, with his customary methodical exactness, gives their number as 5,400, all of them gold or silver. Sheshbazzar, whom we are afterwards to know as Zerubbabel, of the royal house of David, was to go with the returning exiles as their governor and Jeshua as their high priest. Cyrus doubtless expected that the Hebrews would avail themselves of his permission and go back to Palestine in a body. But he did not know them. They had settled down in Babylon and were prosperous, and were reluctant to go back to a desolate country which they would have to reclaim, the cities of which could not be rendered habitable without a great expenditure of money and labor. Not more than 45,360, about one in six of the whole number of captives, were willing to return. These, with some 7,000 slaves, journeyed back to Palestine. In the company were 4,289 priests, and 752 Levites. A guard of a thousand cavalrymen accompanied them to protect them from the Arabs and bands of musicians and singers beguiled the weariness of the journey. This first restoration occured in 536, seventy years after the first deportation by Nebuchadnezzar when Daniel and his friends were carried captives to Babylon. Ezra was not born at the time Cyrus issued his decree, and it was not until eighty years later, when Artaxerxes issued a second decree that Ezra and his company returned.

ANCIENT IMAGE OF CYRUS WITH HIS NAME AT FOOT

The Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. God has more to do with the ways of kings and the policy of governments than they know of. He can so order the arrangement of circumstances and events that they will do what he wishes them to do, of their own accord, fancying all the time that they are following their own way, when they are really doing the will of God. Mr. Beecher used to say that when he was a boy, his father was bent on his becoming a minister, while he was determined on being a sailor. One day, after he had attempted to run away to sea, the old gentleman called him into his study, and told him that if he was really resolved on being a sailor, he could help him. He had sufficient influence to get him an appointment, which was true. "But," he said, "you don't want to be a common sailor. You should be an officer and command a ship." Henry admitted that was his ambition. "Then," said the father, "you must have a good education: you must learn geography and navigation and something of foreign languages. You will have to go to college and study, otherwise you will not be able to pass the examination for captain." Henry recognized the good sense of his father's advice and began to study. "I shall see that boy in the pulpit yet," said the father.

He is the God. It would be well if we could accept the king's statement as evidence of his being a worshiper of the one true God. But, unhappily, there is proof of his tendering the same reverence to Nebo, Bel, Merodach, and other deities. He might well have been bewildered by the multiplicity of deities, but even in this the Oriental mind is able to find unity in diversity. They say that a Greek, a Persian and a Jew stood before the king, who demanded of them that they tell him who was the Supreme Being. The Greek said that it was Zeus: the Persian that it was Ahura Mazda, and the Jew said, "Adhonai whose name is unutterable, he is God." The strife among them grew so fierce that the king was about to order them all to be put to death, when one of his wise men interposed. He asked each of them to tell him the name of the sun. The Greek answered Helios: the Persian, Mithras; and the Jew, Shemesh. "O, foolish men," said the counsellor, "it is the same sun, and God is the same God by whatsoever name you call him."

YOUNG FARMERS FISHING FOR SHAD ON THE POTOMAC

PERHAPS the most significant and hopeful sign in the condition of the Afro-American race, is the disposition, now and then, of one of their own number to do something for the race itself. Kipling has written of the white man's burden. The cultivated black man has also a burden. The attitude of the colored man has usually been that of a recipient. He has seldom been on the giving hand. This is going to be different. It is often made a boast, that the colored race pays taxes to the amount of so many millions. This is a legitimate boast, but it is a material one. What does the colored race give to found institutions for itself and its children? No race can become great from what it receives of another race. It must learn to give. "If any man would be great among you, let him be your servant." First, must come to the individual the disposition of self-help; next, the disposition to help others. There are many millions of property in the hands of the colored people. This is a great honor, but the time will come when the colored millionaire will do as do the white millionaires. This must be so before the race can achieve any marked moral greatness. There must be black Rockefellers and black Carnegies.

A very original and unique effort to help his race, is a recent one of W. H. H. Hart, professor in the Law Dept., and teacher of Agriculture in Howard University. Mr. Hart came up from Alabama, a barefooted, ragged boy, without friend or helper, and entered the Normal Department of Howard University. He worked his way through all the departments, graduating with honor, finally, in the Law School, where he has now been professor some ten years or more. He is an enthusiast in his devotion to his Alma Mater, to whose claims he is always ready to respond. It was in his study of the subject of University Extension, that his present project began to take shape. He saw hundreds of colored boys, from eight to eighteen years, in the streets of Washington. They were idle, unemployed, likely to become criminals. What could Howard University do for them? The matter was laid before the Trustees of the University. The Trustees saw no way in which they could reach the difficulty. Meantime, Mr. Hart, whose anxiety was urgent, laid the subject before the Board of Childrens' Guardians; especially before the Superintendent of Charities for the District of Columbia, offering his farm and his services to them, as they had been offered to the University. Here he was successful.

Mr. Hart's farm is down on the Maryland shore of the Potomac, some twelve miles below Washington city. Side by side with this farm near Fort Washington is one owned by Hon. William M. Evarts, to whom Mr. Hart was three years private secretary. Of this second farm, making in all a tract of land extending a mile up and down the river and about a mile and a half back into the State of Maryland, Mr. Hart secured from Mr. Evarts a gratuitous grant, so long as used for the purpose then contemplated. There were but two dwellings on the place: one, which had been used by the farmer, and the other, an elegant cabin used for summer outings by Mr. Evarts and household. In this latter, the farm school was opened in 1897. Mr. Hart has solicited money enough since to erect a wooden structure, two stories high, which is used for school room and sleeping room. It is named Barrows Hall, after the Hon. Samuel J. Barrows.

Mr. Hart has great fondness for horses and cattle, of which he has several notable representatives on his farm. The pupils are superintended by Robert J. Evans, a graduate of Hampton Institute, who has four or more assistants. Among the pupils is a Korean; also a Porto Rican, who followed the United States troops home from that island to Cleveland, O., and there met President Rankin. There are now forty-two boys on this farm. All of them are healthy, happy, and easily governed. Indeed, the personality of Mr. Hart seems to act as a restraining influence, even in his absence. To show this, last Christmas, Mr. Hart gave them all a holiday, to be spent in Washington, the understanding being that they should report at the steamboat dock. The next morning all were there.

For $185 a year Mr. Hart boards and clothes them, and gives them instruction in agriculture, blacksmithing and wheel-wrighting. This is less than it costs to care for the inmates of the Reform School; to say nothing of the different surroundings and prospects that are before them. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are given by the benevolent for other branches of educational and sociological work. Here is a branch that combines both characteristics. It prevents criminality; it cures it. It is well worth solid encouragement. Mr. Hart needs gifts of money, clothing, books, new buildings, and a cheering word from all God's people who are anxious to hear the word: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

A SYRIAN STORE KEEPER AND HIS WIVES — A TYPICAL SYRIAN CAFÉ — IN NATIONAL COSTUME

AMONG the many different nationalities represented in our immigration—which embraces almost every race and people under the sun—there is none more picturesque or interesting than the Syrian. Moved by the love of freedom and attracted by the promise of brighter surroundings and happier lives than were possible in their own oppressed and impoverished land, they have come hither from the cities and villages of ancient Syria, from the Lebanon and the lowlands, filled with hope and ambition.

It is said that the first Syrian immigrant reached the United States as early as 1853, and in 1878 they were coming in considerable numbers. After 1880, owing to restrictive action by our own government and prohibitive edicts by the Porte, emigration was beset with additional difficulties. But the Greek emigration agents were busy, nevertheless, among the peasantry of the hillsides and valleys of Syria, and thousands were induced to brave the difficulties of Turkish extortion and to run the gauntlet of official inquiry for the sake of being permitted to go. Since 1888, they have continued to come; and peasants, students, clerks, small merchants, peddlers of crosses, amulets and curios, sellers of laces and quaint embroideries, and artisans of almost every trade and calling known to the Orient have found their homes in the free Western world. Our photographer has given us, on these two pages, some familiar and characteristic scenes in the Syrian quarter of New York City. They herd together, speak their own language, and, as far as practical, preserve their ancient customs amid their new and strange surroundings. Their shops retail the food to which they were accustomed at home, and their restaurants are duplicates of the coffee-houses in many Syrian cities. Their form of worship, too, is unchanged, and the same rites and ceremonials that have been observed for centuries in their native land may be witnessed in their [illegible] Few of the better class of Syrians come here, however, although many of those who do come are well educated and excellent linguists. Nearly all are of an easy, indolent nature, and indisposed to any labor that involves much physical exertion. They are keen and shrewd as traders, whether buying or selling, and as they live with extreme economy, they can save money where others would probably fail. The Syrian usually leaves his home with one object in view—to make money, return to his native village, buy a little land and live there in comparative comfort the rest of his days. Just what proportion of the whole realize this ambition, it is impossible even to conjecture. Like a few other nationalities who come here, the Syrian does not readily assimilate, nor does he as a general thing regard the United States as his permanent home. His eye and heart are fixed on Lebanon, and while some may, and doubtless do, adopt American ways and customs with American citizenship, the great majority are "birds of passage." Visiting the Syrian quarter, one hears little

English spoken; everywhere the jargon of the Asiatic peasant, pleasant enough and not unmusical perhaps to a native ear, but harsh and tedious to Americans. If one accosts a Syrian in English, it is quite likely that the stranger—though he may have been on freedom's soil for a year or more—will have to refer to some clever fellow-Syrian as interpreter before making himself understood. But there are other foreign colonies in New York—notably the Chinese, Hebrew, Spanish and Arab—in which men and women can be found who never acquire the language of the land of their exile, though they may have been in the United States half a lifetime. It has been said repeatedly that no Chinaman ever wishes to die away from the land of his birth. It is probably equally true of the Syrian. His sojourn here, however, is an enlightenment and an education in the ways of civilization and progress. Last year's official reports showed a total immigration of 229,259. While the number of arrivals from many countries has decreased during the last decade, those from Asia have increased. From 1881 to 1890, inclusive, the total immigration from Asia was 63,932, but since that time China has sent us her thousands. Many Japanese have come here, and ancient Syria has emptied her villages and mountain hamlets into the great tide of adventure hitherward. In these picturesque newcomers, from a land rich in Biblical associations, and ages ago the seat of one of the greatest military powers on earth, it is difficult to note any remaining trace of the glory and greatness of their past history. They apparently have been transformed, by centuries of Turkish mastery, from a strong and aggressive to a servile race, and though here and there one catches an occasional fleeting spark of enthusiasm and a note of independence, the prevailing tone is that of a docile and willing obedience. While not handsome, according to Western standards, they are a graceful and attractive people, the men well-knit and muscular, the women olive-complexioned but lustrous-eyed and willowy in form. Most attractive of all are the children, whose chubby, smiling faces, bright eyes and trim, sturdy little figures will compare well with the little folks of any nationality in Uncle Sam's dominions.

Mazloum Bey, an educated Syrian, now residing in this country, writing on the subject of his nation's progress, says: "The amelioration of the peasants' condition in both mental and material respects can best be represented by the three villages of Bsherre, Artaba and Hasroom in Kesrawan, the greatest part of whose inhabitants have at one time or another emigrated to America and returned thence to their homes with greatly improved purses and improved brains. Side by side with the hovel-like houses and stone huts, with their rough outline and generally dirty appearance, rise fine, neat structures, with tiled roofs and balustraded balconies, a happy imitation of the common type of American country-houses of respectability . . . On the common highway leading to the village fountain in Hasroom, about sunset, there is seen the peasant woman who has recently returned from the States, and become to all appearances thoroughly Americanized, be it in her manner of speech or mode of attire. She is dressed à l'Américaine, with hat and silk umbrella, and leans on the arm of her young man, who is Americanized, too. . . . Close by trudges along her sister peasant, in all the shabby primitiveness of her mountain garments . . . a rude jar poised on her bemantled head. Such are the traveled and untraveled Syrian.

The Crime Against Children

RECENT events have shown people anew the perils to which they expose their children, when in the care of irresponsible nurses. Nor can we fail to see the wisdom of affixing the severest penalty to the crime of stealing little children, whether by forcible seizure or with the collusion of their nurses. Looked at aright, there are few crimes more cruel than such a crime. To know that a child is dead, is a mercy compared with the apprehension that it is living in an environment of degradation and sin. All that is said in the Bible about angel-ministry to God's little folks, the scene where the mothers of Judea bring their babes and little children to the Saviour, that he may put his hands on them in blessing, impresses us with the sacredness of childhood in the eyes of God and among the inhabitants of the celestial world. It was beautiful to see the sympathy, so general, for the little waif, Marion Clark, and the almost universal joy of the community, when she was found and restored to her parents. It was only the people, who made merchandise of the Lord's little ones and of the tender affections of home and home-life that were excepted. The severe sentence of the principal in this crime against what is holiest in our nature, ought in the words of the District Attorney, "to vindicate law, insure peace to the community and prevent the repetition of such a hideous crime."

Coney Island Park

CONEY Island has long been known as a place of unprofitable, if not vicious recreation. Advantage has been taken of the attractive surf, of the nearness to the great cities, of the need of wholesome sport, to maintain there resorts where man's worst passions are fostered and confirmed. Indeed, the place has become the synonym of immorality and crime.

This is all to be changed. The people need a great park. There are millions of such people close by. They have no summer vacations. All day long, all night long, they throng the hot city pavements, work in ill-ventilated rooms, indulge in various corrupting pursuits, turn night into hideousness, while they are within reach of a beach, bathed with dashing surf, and breathing the pure air that comes wafted across leagues of ocean.

Coney Island beach has been too long taken possession of by a few thousand people, who have made their money out of human idleness and vice. It does not belong to them. It is God's gift to the children, to the families of the poor. Let them have it, properly safe-guarded and protected. They do not ask for the saloon, nor the gambling resort. They do not need any such associations. Let them have a chance at the blue sky, and the white surf, and the invigorating plunge, and they will be more contented, healthier and happier. Already the great churches have put in their plea. Let the city government seize the opportunity and convert the district, which fire has purified, into the future playing grounds of children. It is a matter that concerns public morals, the churches, the school houses, and the families of Greater New York.

France Redeeming Herself

THE modern world has seen no such spectacle as Republican France submitting to the outrageous treatment of Dreyfus. The possibility of a combination of army officials in a plot to forge testimony against an innocent officer of the same army, to bring upon him and his family a judgment of infamy and imprisonment, such as was almost sure to terminate in death: this seems awful. And when Zola interposed at the risk of exile, asking only for a rehearing of the case, only for a fair trial, to see the rage awakened against him: rage not short of the madness of a bloodthirsty wild beast let loose in the coliseum, has compelled the wonder of the world.

But this has all gone by. France has recovered herself. Dreyfus returns and has another trial. His enemies have confessed, have taken their own lives, have disappeared from the arena, have gone beforehand to the judgment. This is true. But, when we recall the confession of Esterhazy, that what he did, he did under the direction of his superiors. Here is a gulf of military infamy, which it will be hard for the world to forget. Military honor, if this goes, what is there left? The military officials requiring testimony to be manufactured, so that an innocent man might be crushed to the earth. And this is the land of Lafayette!

As religion comes in at the front door, mirth and laughter will not go out of the back door. It will not hopple the children's feet. John will laugh just as loud: and George will jump higher than he ever did before. It will steal from the little ones neither ball nor bat, nor hoop, nor kite. It will establish a family altar. Angels will hover over it. Ladders of light will reach down to it. The glory of heaven will stream upon it. The books of remembrance will record it: and tides of everlasting blessedness will pour from it.

Forty Millions in Gifts!

1899 Eclipsing All Its Predecessors in Its Splendid Donations to the Causes of Religion, Education, and Philanthropy

ABOUT the close of 1897 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD called attention to the large amount of individual gifts and bequests, of $5,000 and upward each in value, that had been made or become operative during the year for the promotion of religious, educational and charitable work in the United States. The known value of these benefactions exceeded the grand sum of $45,000,000, the largest of any year since the writer has had occasion to take note of this popular "lending to the Lord."

During 1898 the amount fell to $38,000,000, the second largest amount on record, although the number of individual contributors was larger than ever before. Now, at the close of the first half of 1899, while Federal reports are teeming with evidences of prosperity, and the great industrial interests are showing an activity that is astonishing the rest of the world, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD takes pleasure in presenting a unique semi-annual report, fully substantiated, indicating the extent to which the rising prosperity of the country has acted on the hearts of the people individually.

This mid-summer review shows a most extraordinary and wholly unprecedented amount of individual benefactions. A little less than two hundred of the most noteworthy gifts and bequests of the half year make a total of $37,468,596. Other items, all beyond the minimum of $5,000, would raise this total to more than $37,500,000, or, within less than half a million of the total for the whole of the previous year. Besides these gifts and bequests actually made during the half year, records before the writer show that more than $3,500,000 has been promised by responsible persons, payable in the future either with or without conditions.

The most noteworthy gift ever made to the cause of education was that of Mrs. Leland Stanford, who, on May 31 last, deeded to Stanford University the bulk of all her wealth, consisting principally of stocks and real estate. This property had a face and possible future value of $38,000,000, and a present cash market value of at least $15,000,000. With this gift the endowment of the University is swelled to the great sum of $45,000,000, which may be largely increased by an advance in the market value of the properties composing it.

About twenty-five years ago John Simmons, of Boston, bequeathed a sum of money to trustees for investment for a quarter of a century, at the end of which period they were to apply the accumulated amount to the establishment of a non-sectarian college for women. The twenty-five years expired last spring, and the fund, then available, had reached $2,000,000.

The will of Robert C. Billings, of Boston, filed for probate in June, directed the payment of $900,000 to specified public institutions and charities, and $600,000 to such other charitable institutions as his executors should select.

Baroness Clara de Hirsch, who died in Hungary on April 1, allotted in her will $1,200,000 to the trustees of the Baron de Hirsch Fund of New York, to carry on the work among the Jews that her late husband had inaugurated.

By a compromise of the heirs and the probate of his will in March, the bequests of Edward Austin, of Boston, apportioning $1,100,000 among educational institutions, including $500,000 to Harvard University, became immediately available.

Charles E. Tilford, of New York, bequeathed to the Presbyterian, Mount Sinai, Flower and St. Vincent's Hospitals, the Home for Incurables, St. John's Guild and the Children's Aid Society, the reversion of an estate of $1,000,000, besides $25,000 each to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and the Metropolitan Museum of Art, on the death or remarriage of his widow.

In May, Mrs. Lydia Bradley, who a few years ago founded the Bradley Polytechnic Institute at Peoria, Ill., with twenty acres of ground and $500,000, deeded all her property in Peoria County to the institute, making a gift of over $1,000,000.

Charles Frederick Smith, of Boston, bequeathed his residuary estate of about $1,000,000 to ten charitable institutions, principally in that city.

Henry C. Warren, of Cambridge, Mass., an enthusiastic friend of Harvard University, left that institution all his real estate and securities, valued at nearly $1,[illegible].

In April, J. Pierpont Morgan, of New York, who in 1897 had offered the Society of the Lying-In Hospital $1,000,000 for the erection of a new building, notified the society that, as it had complied with all his conditions, the money was there at its disposal.

An eccentric millionaire of Hanover, Mass., Edward G. Perry, left his joint real and personal estate, estimated at $1,000,000, to trustees, to aid without any discrimination and in any manner deemed proper, the worthy poor of Hanover, Hanson and Pembroke.

Among the notable gifts of the half year are these: Philip D. Armour, to Armour Institute, $750,000; Alonzo L. Kane, to Michigan charities, $400,000; Miss Terena Rhinelander, for St. James Parish buildings, etc., $300,000; Samuel Cupples, to Washington University, $400,000; Anna S. C. Blake, public hospital, Santa Barbara, Cal., $260,000; Andrew Carnegie, for public libraries, $415,000 and pledges of $960,000 more; besides several other large gifts or bequests from various donors.

BRIEF NOTES

Rev. D. Z. Sheffield, a missionary in China, has invented a Chinese typewriter for 4,000 characters in that language.

The Fifth Biennial Convention of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union, will meet in Edinburgh, Scotland, Monday, June 25, 1900.

The largest three schedules of property in Chicago have been filed by three women. The assessors are sceptical about their being the wealthiest property owners in the city. The veracity of the three women, the assessors think, should be taken into consideration.

The Presbyterian Church, North, has published statistics for the year, from which it appears that the net increase of membership after deductions for deaths and exclusions is 8,030. There are 7,312 ministers and 7,657 churches. Contributions for Foreign missions $764,976, and for Home missions 1,095,311. Total contributions for all purposes for the year $13,777,717.

To the Ecumenical Conference on Foreign Missions, to be held in New York next Spring, the following British Societies have promised to send representatives: The London Missionary Society, the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Church Missionary Society, the Presbyterian, Baptist, Wesleyan, and other organizations of England and Ireland, and the established Free and United Churches of Scotland.

The alumni and friends of Mount Hope College, Rogers, Ohio, have raised a fund which will provide free scholarships for one hundred soldier boys who served in the war with Spain. The sole conditions are: Proof of honorable discharge from the army and avowed intention to enter college within one year from Sept. 1st. Applications should be addressed to Pres. Galbreath Mt. Hope College, Rogers, Ohio.

[illegible] is being vigorously conducted. Six large tents are in use in different sections, located with a view to reaching the unchurched masses. The large audiences speak for the splendid success of the movement. The speakers at present in charge are evangelists Munhall, Wharton, Thomas and George C. Needham: also Drs. Burrell, of New York: Carson, of Brooklyn: and Davies and Ottman, of Newark.

A Destructive Tornado

DURING about ten minutes on the afternoon of Wednesday, August 2, the people of Elizabeth, N. J., had an experience such as seldom falls to the lot of an Eastern town. A tornado swept through its streets overturning houses, injuring churches, unroofing buildings and tearing great trees up by the roots. The morning of the day had been excessively hot and sultry. The sky, however, had been clear until two o'clock, when a black cloud formed in the southwest, which rapidly increased in size until it reached to the northeast. A few minutes before three, a violent wind storm struck the town, cutting a clear swath nearly a thousand feet wide through its streets. The First Presbyterian Church was the first to feel its fury. The spire, about a hundred feet high, swayed for a moment before the wind, and then fell a heap of ruins into the street. Farther on the Central Baptist Church was struck and its spire overturned and its great bell carried across the street. Two theatres were unroofed and several public buildings were damaged. One private house was lifted bodily from its foundations and overturned. Another was twisted half way around. The gravestones in the yard of the Presbyterian church were blown down and a number of trees were uprooted, exposing the coffins in the graves they had shaded. Another tree, a great sycamore, said to be a hundred years old, was torn from the ground and driven with such force against a house that it broke in the side and crashed its way into the walls. The house is now used as a home for aged women, and its inmates were panic-stricken as they saw the branches of the tree penetrate ten feet into the upper rooms. Happily no one was hurt there, or in any part of the city. A large number of the towns-people were away at Asbury Park on an excursion, and to that fact must be attributed the remarkable absence of the casualties which usually accompany so severe a storm. Those who witnessed the havoc made by the wind in a few minutes declare that the scene was appalling. In such a situation man realizes his utter helplessness. Although science enables us to understand the cause of such storms, and though we no longer regard them as the ancients did — as signs of God's anger—we cannot but recognize his mighty hand in these forces of nature.

When he uttereth his voice there is a multitude of waters in the heavens, and he causeth the vapors to ascend from the ends of the earth: he maketh lightnings, with rain, and bringeth forth the wind out of his treasures (Jer. 10: 13).

Drifting in the Antarctic

A story of tedious journeying is told by Dr. Frederick A. Cook, of Brooklyn, N.Y., who has returned from the Antarctic regions. He was chief surgeon and anthropologist on the Belgica, a steam whaling vessel which sailed from Antwerp in Belgium for Cape Horn in August, 1897. The vessel had been strengthened and specially prepared for resisting the pressure of ice, and was well equipped with scientific apparatus for taking observations of the winds and ocean currents. From Cape Horn it sailed for Palmer Land, which is a section of the Antarctic continent. There it made the unexpected discovery of a navigable strait two hundred miles long and as wide as the Straits of Majellan. The Belgica sailed through it to the Pacific Ocean, making observations by the way. Thence it proceeded southward until it struck the ice pack. It penetrated for some distance, and, finding further progress impossible, was about to return, when the discovery was made that the ice had formed behind it and it was a prisoner. The ship remained fast in the ice floe for thirteen months. The men on board made the best of their involuntary imprisonment. They were well supplied with warm clothing, and they could take exercise on the floe, which was six miles in diameter. Fresh meat they obtained in abundance by killing the seals, penguins and petrels, that they surprised on the edges of the floe. Their scientific observations soon showed them that though the ship was imbedded it was not stationary. It was traveling with the floe, and its course was almost due west. During the months of their imprisonment they drifted more than two thousand miles, but they did not approach the Pole nearer than the seventy-second degree of latitude, which is more than twelve hundred miles away. As all the ice mountains around them drifted with them and their surroundings were always the same it was difficult for them to realize that they were traveling so far. Their astronomical observations alone told them how rapid their journey was. Perhaps, if people turned their soul's gaze more frequently to heaven, they, too, might learn that permanence was there, not here:

The world passeth away and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever (I. John 2. 17).

Russia's Future Czar

A manifesto issued by Czar Nicholas announces that, so long as it may not please God to bless him with a son, the right of succession to the throne of Russia devolves on his brother Michael Alexandrovitch. This prince who is now in his twenty-first year, is the third son of the late Emperor. His elder brother, the Grand Duke George, was regarded as next heir, but he died on July 10. For eight years past, however, the condition of his health made it evident that he would never become Emperor. He had been delicate as a child, and when he reached the age of twenty, pulmonary disease developed which increased rapidly. He spent all his time at Abbas Tuman, in the Caucasus, one of the most healthy climates in the world. It was evident to all that his early death was inevitable, but it came as a surprise at the last. He was out riding on a motor-tricycle and passed a peasant woman who saw him swaying as if he would fall from his machine. She caught him in her arms as he fell and laid him on the ground. Finding that he was ill, she ran to the palace screaming for help. When assistance arrived, the young prince was dead. The heir to the greatest throne in Europe had died on the roadside like a tramp. His death brings his younger brother, Michael, a step nearer to the throne. His succession, however, is not certain, as the Czar may yet have a son, who would take precedence of Prince Michael. Mighty and illustrious as is the autocrat of all the Russias, his manifesto proves that he is aware that there is one mightier than he, on whose will the future of his country and the perpetuation of his imperial dynasty depend.

Promotion cometh neither from the east nor from the west nor from the south. But God is the judge: he putteth down one and setteth up another (Ps. 75. 6)

A Missing Will Found

A romantic story of the discovery of a long-lost document is related by the New York Herald. It appears that about twenty years ago a lady died in Philadelphia, who left a large family of children. She told her children that she had made her will, and she privately assured her youngest daughter that certain real estate, in Connecticut, had been bequeathed to her. But her death had been sudden and she had had no opportunity of telling her children where she had secreted her will. A search was made for it, but it could not be found. The property was therefore divided, but the youngest daughter received for her share a much smaller amount than she had been led by her mother's words to expect. Among the household effects which fell to her lot was an old hair-cloth settee. It was of little value, but she prized it as a relic of her old home. She is married now and is living in New York. One day, recently, she found between the seat and the back of the old settee a large brooch containing a faded miniature of her father who died a month before she was born. She decided to have this replaced by a portrait of her devoted mother whom she had deeply loved. When the miniature was removed for this purpose a sheet of thin foreign paper was found behind it, which proved to be her mother's long-lost will. It bequeaths to her the Connecticut property as her mother had said, and she has now commenced suit to gain possession of it. The daughter's desire to put her mother's portrait in the locket showed that she still loved her, in spite of the mother's apparent failure to fulfill her promise. If the daughter had resented that failure she would not have found the will in its singular hiding-place. God's children may learn a lesson from her example. When he does not answer their prayers they are apt to let their love for him grow cold. The blessing might come to them if, like the patriarch, they held fast to their faith.

Teachers and Home-Keepers

Home-talks at Chautauqua School and Home —Problems of the Kitchen

THE home, the school, and the child have been receiving the lion's share of attention at Chautauqua this summer. At one meeting of the Chautauqua National Council of Superintendents and Principals, the topic discussed was: "How to Secure the Cooperation of Parents in School Work." Among other interesting things said was the following by Hon. Charles R. Skinner, New York State Superintendent of Public Institutions:

No class of people make more sacrifices for the good of the world than its teachers. The school and the home should be associated, and parents are best reached through pupils. Parents trust too much to the school, and expect not only mental but moral training to be obtained there, but the foundation of morals lies with fathers and mothers. Pupils should be sent to school with a true idea of obedience. The true teacher should understand the child he teaches; and the best teacher is the one who gets nearest the child and its home life. He should go as far as possible into the homes of the children and discover the influences at work in the family circle. We cannot advance unless parents and teachers are in close sympathy.

In the same week with this meeting, a large audience gathered in Assembly Hall to consider a problem not one whit less dignified and important: "Social and Economic Value of Skilled Housework." Mrs. Ewing's lecture on this subject was so good we make some extracts:

Eliminate all unnecessary work and you reduce the work now done in the average home by one-half. One-half the food preparations are needless. Simple food, perfectly prepared, is more satisfactory than many fancy dishes. The economic value of skill in the household can scarcely be overestimated. It saves time by insisting upon labor-saving methods and improvements. Methodical system saves at least one-half the time and reduces the amount of labor one-half. Skill in housework saves money by saving material, cutting off waste, breakage and destruction generally, which is the outcome of ignorance, carelessness and awkwardness. When skill is introduced into the household it ceases to be drudgery, and at once becomes the most charming and interesting occupation in which a woman can engage. Housework skilfully done has greater, sweeter and more enduring compensation than any other field of labor open to women.

Discussing the servant question, laughter was provoked by the assertion that the word servant was often a misnomer, as the servant so called was frequently the tyrant of the home. It was urged that housework must be regarded as an honorable profession and not merely a make-shift for a living; and that the badge of servitude must be in some way removed from it.

Our Farmer Boys

Shall I send my boy to college? Shall I keep him on the farm? Shall I let him go to sea or into the army as he wants to go? Many an honest father's heart is asking itself these questions. Many a farmhouse mother is laying these matters before God and trying to see the light. Hundreds of our boys leave the old farm and come to the city every year. A few make their mark; the large majority never rise any higher than the position of salesman in a department store; not because they have not gifts and faithfulness but because cities are overcrowded. The truth is, the country needs men and the cities do not. It is natural, it is right that a young man should want to go forth and make a living and a position for himself. Far be it from us to lay the smallest stone of discouragement in his path. If his mind is set city-ward or sea-ward or to the army, perhaps there is nothing for the parents to do but to let the boy go; and if he goes, there is surely nothing to do but send prayers and blessings with him. Yet, we hope that the time is not far distant when, through agricultural colleges, through Government experimental farms, and through every stimulus that can be devised, the interest of youth may be drawn to farm-work; while through circulating libraries, lecture courses, reading clubs, golf-links and other possible recreation, the social attractions of rural districts may hold the farmer's son at home, and tempt the tired city boy to seek fortune and happiness in the country.

Cheer For Mother

A great deal is said about the need of making home cheerful for the husband and father to return to, says Dinah Sturgis in the American Kitchen Magazine, but these admonitions ought not to be so one-sided. The wife and mother has not only a right but a very great need to have her evenings and some of her days made more cheerful and relaxing. More attention should be given in America's poor homes to wholesome pleasure that can be enjoyed by the entire family circle.

A Prayerful Mother

The memory of a prayerful mother is a life-long blessing and protection, as many letters received at this office bear witness. A reader in Layfayette, Ind., who came to this country years ago, writes us the following incidents, and says: "While memory lasts I shall not forget these inspiring pictures of a Christian mother, kneeling in prayerful faith before God."

In my fatherland, in the forties, a cloudburst visited Melsungen, my native town; and the sudden appearance of several feet of water on the south side of our home filled all with dismay. Mother, fully believing in that old German proverb, "when danger is greatest God is nearest," knelt in prayer in that back, lower room of our home, facing the flood, imploring God's intervening aid, with myself, a little lad, on one side of her, and my younger brother on the other. The city was saved, as [illegible] sailing in mid-ocean; and again, in memory's picture, I see my mother on her knees, asking [illegible] passengers safely to land. I believed in my [illegible] and prayers learned at her knee have been a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night.

The Breakfast Hour

The family reunion after the night is passed and ere the day's life and labors are begun, exerts lasting influence on hours and tasks that follow. The breakfast hour should be cheerful, loving and courteous—a time of spiritual as of bodily refreshment—an inspiration to carry us through the work and trials of the day. If through some great sorrow smiles are not for the moment possible, the jewels of sweetness, patience and fortitude, may brighten even that table where the vacant chair reminds us of a lately lost loved one.

Let each one of us resolve afresh to contribute more and more to the beauty, the serenity, and the tonic power of the day's first reunion. Burying oneself in morning papers is to miss opportunities; reading about tragedies contained in these sheets is to imperil the digestion of the company and to fill minds with depressing thoughts where refreshing ones are needed. Do not let the hour degenerate into an occasion for naming errands to those who are going to town—unless giving and taking of commissions can be made a merry matter—an opportunity for play of wit and proof of considerateness. Simple fare may be wholesome, a coarse cloth clean, and the spirit of love and good fellowship makes the humblest meal "a feast where kings might dine."

"Thank You"

The little man or woman who does our errands is entitled to acknowledgment. When Harry brings the thimble or the spool of thread for his older sister, or mails a letter for big brother, or takes a message or package for mamma or papa, they will do it more cheerfully and prettily when grown folks preface requests with "If you please," and reward service with a gracious "Thank you." Besides, children accustomed to such courtesy from their elders, will instinctively observe the same rules among themselves.

LITTLE GOATHERDS TENDING THEIR FLOCKS

This picture will bring familiar scenes to the minds of many of our readers, who coming from the old world, have made our country their home. In Switzerland, around Naples, and in other parts of Europe, children are frequently seen apparently at play, but keeping watchful eyes on charges that, made gentle by kindness, linger near them. Nor is the picture altogether strange in America: for in many sections our native and foreign-born farmers prize the milk of the goat and the flesh of the kid. In Harlem, a beautiful part of New York City, settled and named by the thrifty Dutch, goats and kids wandering at ease over suburban fields and rocks are still seen, to the surprise and amusement of visitors, who did not look for such a pastoral spectacle in the great Metropolis. To Bible readers, pictures of feeding flocks always call up Scriptural scenes. Goats have formed an important part of the pastoral wealth of the East: and it was among the wild goats of Engedi that Saul sought David and his men. These animals still frequent Engedi's cliff and fountain.

God Save the Boys

G[illegible]

The death-traps of Satan are many,
And fain would he lure them within;
[illegible]

Remember the mothers who pray;
Their hopes in their darlings are centered—
God, save the dear children today.

And pity the boys worse than orphaned,
For sad has their heritage been;
[illegible]

Unheeding the dangers therein;
And wild are the oats some are sowing—
God, save the dear boys from all sin!

Help them to remember the reaping,
Save all from the "wages of sin";
Let good seeds be found in their keeping,
And harvests of good gathered in.

[illegible]

God, save the dear boys!—God, save the dear [illegible]

Thou knowest the strongest may fall;
From peril, from snare and temptation,
We pray thee, oh Lord, save them all.

A "Cry Baby"

ELLEN'S mamma was worried. The child came crying, the third time in one day, to murmur between sobs that a playmate (a different one each time) had "hit her." Ellen never struck any one, but it seemed one of her ways to get hit. Mamma began to feel that somehow the trouble must lie with the little girl—who gentle as she was had a knack of provoking others to anger. She began to watch, unobserved by Ellen, and this is what she saw next day: Ellen, quite dignified, went to little Bob's shelf of toys and took down the engine she had just heard him arrange to lend Fred if Fred would lend him his tin soldiers. When Bob saw her with the engine, he looked as if it were a thing he expected, and he asked her for it in short order: she gently and persistently declined to give it up; whereupon Bob slapped her and took it away. Another time when the children were playing "a train of cars," each child representing a coach and the whole band running around whistling, screaming, puffing, and blowing at a great rate, Ellen, who declined to be a coach, continued to get in their way at every turn, and to be run over. Rosie put a bunch of flowers in a cup that Ellen used: Ellen quickly took them out and laid them on the window-sill in the sun where Rosie found them dead, and declared Ellen "a mean girl." Mamma sorrowfully understood: the child wanted an occasion to cry, wanted sympathy and notice: and was growing selfish and false. Every time she came crying to mamma that day, mamma took her in her arms lovingly and kindly, but saying firmly: "We must not provoke others to anger. I am so sorry you have made the children naughty."

She pursued this until light dawned on Ellen and she lost her title of "Cry Baby." That it is quite as bad to make others cross as to be cross oneself, others besides Ellen need to learn.

Bossie's Kindness

Bossie, a young cow, a soft-eyed, gentle-mannered creature, had lost her little calf and was grieving for it, says her owner, who tells this story. "Some Texas ponies were put in the stock-field with her in the day-time. One of them—a meek, spiritless little thing—took sick: and because Bossie was so gentle and kind, we put him in the stable with her. After a few days, we noticed that she was caressing him and paying him every attention possible. When the cold was especially severe he would snuggle up to her, and seemed to take great comfort from her care. In comforting the baby pony that may be was homesick for the Texas prairies, she forgot her bereavement which had oppressed her so that we were not troubled about her."

Green Pastures

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Aug. 27. Ps. 23: 1-6

HOW many a troubled heart has found rest and peace and sweet confidence in this Psalm. In all the world's literature there is no passage which has comforted so many weary and perplexed and apprehensive souls. Man is so constituted by nature that he must make an attempt to look forward into the fog that covers all before him and he sees enough in his own experience and in that of others to make his heart sink as he thinks of the ordeal that he must pass through. What will be his lot in the bustle and turmoil of life? How will he fare in old age? Do hunger and privations await him? When he falls sick and the shadow of death falls upon him, how will it be with him then? When his enemies surround him and cut off his resources, will he be humiliated and succumb? Such questions come into the minds of men in solitary hours, in the darkness of the night, or in days of anxiety, and we know not how to answer them. Riches have wings, as we know, and they may fly away; it is not safe to trust in them. Health and strength can not be assured, even to the most fortunate. The prince and the millionaire fall sick and die. There is no permanence, no security of the continuance of any material joy. What is our future to be? Like water in the desert comes the thought, "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want. Goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever."

This advantage the Christian who has faith in his God, certainly has over the worldling—he knows that his future is secure. Trouble may come and there may be suffering, and death cannot be escaped, but in all he will have sympathy, companionship, guidance and protection. After all, such a conviction is no small element of happiness. It removes the anxiety, which is the most formidable foe of peace. For the pleasures he renounces, the indulgences he foregoes, he has this compensation of rest and security. He is not promised immunity from trial, but that in his trial, whatsoever its nature may be, he will be supported and helped. The Psalmist's mind reverts to his early occupation as he considers his future. He feels himself to be like a sheep in his ignorance and helplessness, and he rejoices that he has a shepherd in God. As he used to lead his sheep to the best pastures and the still waters, so God will provide for him. As he guided them away from the precipices and dangerous places, and led them in straight paths, so God would guide him in the way of righteousness. As his shepherd's crook defended them and kept them from straying, so God has a rod and a staff that will comfort him.

The green pastures to which the Psalmist refers are no mere figure of speech. The Christian does get nourishment from God's provision. We cannot explain how it is, but there are multitudes who can testify from experience that the strength of their being comes from Christ. They know what Christ meant when he described himself as the bread, whereof if a man eat he shall never hunger, and have drunk of that living water which Christ gives, whereof if a man drink he shall never thirst. The spirit within us needs nourishment as much as does the outer man, and this Christ only can supply. After communion with him the man feels strengthened and goes out invigorated to meet the temptations of life. His appetite grows like that it feeds upon, so that new grace and new impartations of Christ's life seem the most desirable things it is possible to attain. The pleasures of sense lose their charm and seem frivolous and insipid to one who has been feeding in these green pastures. Just as a young man, who is absorbed in some fascinating scientific pursuit, looks upon the toys which delighted him in his boyhood, the man whose spiritual nature has been quickened regards the pleasures which once satisfied him and still satisfy others. The new man, the real self which makes of the body a mere habitation, has capacities for enjoyment infinitely greater than those possessed by the body, and it is these that are satisfied in the green pastures and beside the living waters. When once a man has enjoyed these he testifies, "At thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore."

The New War Secretary

IN the appointment of Hon. Elihu Root, as Secretary of War, to succeed Secretary Alger, President McKinley has added to his Cabinet a lawyer of national reputation and wide experience. For upwards of thirty years

Copyrighted 1899. Underwood, N. Y.

HON. ELIHU ROOT, SECRETARY OF WAR

Mr. Root has been one of the foremost practitioners and has successfully conducted very many important cases in the courts of New York. He was born in Clinton, Oneida County, N. Y., in 1845. His father was a professor of mathematics in Hamilton College, and the son was a graduate of that institution. He taught for a year after leaving college, and then entered upon the study of law at the New York University and began active practice at the bar in the year 1867.

Mr. Root's career at the bar has been a remarkably successful one. His triumphs have been the result of the most earnest application to his profession, and it is said that he has few equals in the thoroughness with which he prepares his cases, making himself master of the minutest detail. He has, also, been identified to some extent in politics, and has taken an active part in reform movements in New York for a number of years past. He is President of the Union League Club and was for many years Vice-President of the Bar Association. To his new position he brings the highest legal capacities, a matured and well-stored mind and a dignity of character and uprightness of conduct which have won him the respect of bench, bar and citizens in his own and other States.

The Brazos Valley Sufferers

RELIEF work has not completed its mission to farmers and laborers in the Brazos Valley. The distress caused by a disaster so overwhelming as that which visited the unfortunate section is not removed so quickly. Public sympathy in various parts of the Union has been sincere and active. Governor Sayers, the Central Relief Committee and its various auxiliaries have dispensed with energy and discretion funds and supplies contributed. Where possible, supplies have been forwarded to needy districts by train; where train connections have not been restored, boats and steamers going up and down swollen streams, delivered supplies at different points to local committees, who were instructed to relieve distress of all kind without regard to religion, race or politics, so long as the applicant is worthy.

Earnest efforts are being made to find work for the multitudes cast out of employment. The flood has for the present, resulted in almost the financial paralysis of farmers whose crops—the farmer's capital—were literally swept off the face of the earth; whose vegetable gardens shared the same fate; and whose milk cows, chickens, and work animals were destroyed. They even had not seed for planting new crops of such things as might be grown at this season.

In the investigations by the Waco relief committee, it was found that many were homeless and starving. Chills and fevers succeeded the flood, and the committee is paying for physicians and medicine. The mayor is still sending quinine to indigent flood sufferers.

The Governor is directing special attention to the purchase and distribution of seed supplies; and relief committees, planters and laborers are diligently seeking to restore bridges, fences and houses. Churches and school buildings shared, of course, the fate of the farmers' and laborers' dwellings. The soil of the Brazos Valley is fertile; the afflicted citizens are displaying most commendable patience, courage and enterprise; and, in due time, the wilderness "shall blossom as the rose for them."

In the meanwhile, the people are enduring much want and suffering, undergoing many hardships and facing tremendous difficulties. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has taken pleasure in extending the hand of help to the flood sufferers. Some of its readers have claimed the privilege of sharing this pleasure; contributions from others who wish to cooperate will be cheerfully acknowledged. Any trouble which develops fraternal feeling and Christian helpfulness, is not wholly a misfortune. Relief committees are expressing thankfulness for aid already rendered to those made homeless and penniless by the flood. These sums have been received:

"Woman's Work is Never Done."

The constant care causes sleeplessness, loss of appetite, extreme nervousness, and that tired feeling. But a wonderful change comes when Hood's Sarsaparilla is taken. It gives pure, rich blood, good appetite, steady nerves.

A Girl's Letter From Northfield—Clear Vision—A Word About Bible Classes

WOULD the group on the veranda like to read a girl's letter from Northfield? So many eyes and hearts are turned every summer to that Pisgah height of peace and promise that I am quite sure of those who have been there: they will understand the charm and joy and blessedness of Northfield, and its rare and wonderful opportunities for personal contact with souls and for communion with Christian friends and with Christ. There are multitudes who have never yet tasted the sweetness which brims a Northfield cup, and they may learn something from Katharine's letter to Dorothy, about one significant feature of every summer, the Young Women's Conference. This gathering of girls from all parts of the country, college students, college alumnæ and business women, is under the auspices of the American Committee of the Y. W. C. A., which has its headquarters in Chicago. Four members of this committee were present at the recent Conference, as were four of the busy secretaries who carry on the large work, and a very numerous contingent of the resident secretaries who carry on the city work, and of the presidents and secretaries of the various Christian Associations which are formed in our women's colleges, and which exercise so strong an influence on the college life of girls in our country. And now for Katharine's letter:

"E. NORTHFIELD, Mass., July 24, 1899.

"DEAR DOROTHY:—The afternoon shadows are lengthening, and we in Marquand Hall, two hundred of us at the table, are presently going to our last tea together this summer, before our farewell sunset meeting on Round Top. Miss Effie Kelley Price, who has led this Conference so splendidly, will conduct this meeting, and a later farewell assemblage in the Auditorium will be in charge of Mr. Moody. We grow very much attached to Mr. Moody, as in our summers here we learn something of his great heart of love to humanity and his loyalty to his Master. You would be pleased if you could hear the students of the Northfield Seminary and of Mount Hermon speak of the many acts of individual kindness which he shows them during their school course, always planning for their comfort, always looking out for their good. The group of buildings here at Northfield, Revell, Marquand, East, Weston and Stone Hall, the completely equipped gymnasium, the new dormitory now building, and the several cottages, together with the spacious Auditorium, show what can be done by one man working with God. Betsy Moody Cottage is just across the way from the Auditorium and is named for Mr. Moody's mother. It is used during our Conference as the headquarters of the leaders, and their home, and in the winter, and, indeed, all the school year, it is the hospital for the seminary girls, if any of them are ill.

"You remember Dorothy, what Mrs.—— told us about this place when she came to our college last February. Well, all she said was true, only she did not say half enough. Five hundred young women, two-thirds of them students, perhaps even more than two-thirds, counting the alumnæ. The remainder, women in business life, are of themselves an inspiring sight. We came from Smith College, fifty of us: from Mount Holyoke, sixty: from Vassar, twenty-seven: from the Woman's College of Baltimore: from Syracuse, Boston, Vermont, and Ann Arbor Universities, from Bates and Colby Colleges, from Radcliffe and Barnard, from some of the smaller schools of the South: having representatives from North Carolina, Virginia, and Tennessee: and we have seen in our number this year, a sweet-faced daughter of Japan, a quiet Hindoo, and a gentle mannered graduate of Hampton, Va. They all meet on equal terms, and an atmosphere of the most genial friendliness pervades the whole throng. The young ladies of the Northfield Seminary dignify homely service by the grace with which they perform it. The cooking, waiting, and chamberwork being in their hands. Sometimes the rest of us turn in for a day and relieve them, for we do not want them to lose the privileges of the Conference, in their care for our comfort.

"WE have meetings from half-past eight to twelve: everybody taking what attraction she prefers. As a rule, all students enter our Bible class. The choice this year has been between Miss Babcock, of New York, and Professor Knight, of Springfield. Both teachers have had full classes, which have done thorough work. Mr. Robert E. Speer, whose delightful personality and matchless grace of manner on the platform are familiar, taught every morning from the Gospel of John. It is customary for us to carry notebooks and pencils, and take notes while the speaker addresses us. With Mr. Speer some of us found this rather difficult; his eloquence is like the tidal flow of the waves, and it did not always lend itself with ease to the girlish scribe and her pencil.

"In the afternoon there were conferences of the student volunteers, and of other workers: in the evening always a meeting on Round Top, indescribably beautiful, with people setting in rows on the green grass, the hills in the distance, the speaker standing in the centre of the listening circle. Last of all, was the evening in the Auditorium, and then, as a finale, the tender little good-night prayer gatherings in the different halls, before going to rest.

"I think I hear you say, But is there no break in the attendance on religious exercises? Let me whisper that we have a reception day, and a college field day, and basket ball, tennis, sports of all kinds, with walking and driving and picnicing in the long sweet afternoons. And we learn something of the great college world as a whole: the Western girl makes acquaintance with her Eastern sister—the girl who is going luxuriously through her college course claps hands with another who is working her way through. The good times are evident, the young faces shine, a spirit of gladness and good fellowship obtains, and, back to the daily life these young people carry the uplifting impression of ten days in a hallowed place, like a sanctuary, to help others all the year.

"KATHARINE."

BIBLE classes are of many kinds. Some desire scholarly investigation, some want quickening of their love. Many are most useful because they show people how to study God's Word. If we cannot join a class, we may with confidence study the Bible at home, and every one who asks will have the Holy Spirit for a teacher. No other guide can so illuminate the Scriptures, so lead us into the knowledge of the truth.

SPEAKING of personal interviews with unbelievers, a friend said the other day that what they needed most was clearer vision. Alas, for many of our dear friends, they are color-blind to whatever concerns the kingdom. You tell them of the duty and the joy of service, of the need of surrendered will, of Christ's ineffable love, and they stare at you as if you were raving. They have not the key which interprets to them your meaning, if I may change the figure. Come and see, is what we should say to those who do not know the Lord. They will not know him until they see him.

Thank God, there shall dawn a day when,

> We shall see Him face to face,
> And tell the story, saved by grace.

Some of us can best express our feelings in the lines of Owen Meredith:

> If Jesus came to earth again,
> And walked and talked in field and street,
> Who would not leave his human pain
> Low at those heavenly feet?
> And leave the loom, and leave the lute,
> And leave the volume on the shelf,
> To follow him unquestioning, mute,
> If 'twere the Lord himself.

But to the eyes that are opened, Christ is now and forever here.

Bed-Time Hour At Our Children's Home

THERE is no sweeter, holier time at our Children's Home than that of folding the lambs for the night. At seven, tired players come trooping in, twenty-five to a dormitory. Big ones aid teachers in helping little ones to undress, and the sweetest spirit of fellowship prevails. When "Our Father" has been murmured and the little ones are all abed, "teacher" takes her big chair near the centre of the room, a lot of small garments around her, each needing a stitch here, a button there. "A story, teacher," they plead; and while she tells a sweet old Bible story which impresses on their young minds the sweet old Bible truths that are ever new and dear, they listen, and eyelids begin to droop. Many seem to study pictures which "teacher" has fastened on the wall, with a pathetic admiration and yearning for the beautiful, which their cramped, malodorous city homes fail to fill in any measure. Others whisper impressively about how glad mamma will be to see them looking so fat and brown when they go home next day, of the flowers they have gathered to take to the loved ones at home, of the good, new clothes they will take back, and of how wonderful it is that people should be so kind to them; other little ones, whose homes are very dark and who do not want to return to them, are weeping. But presently all are asleep and "teacher" moving from bed to bed, breathes a mother's prayer over each little slumberer.

How Churches are Killed

"WHAT is the cause of the death of so many churches," is a question frequently asked by earnest Christian people. A variety of reasons may be assigned, but in many cases the event is only to be explained in one way. What that is is set forth in a letter from a reader (L. O. S.), who writes from Osprey, Maxwell, Ont., as follows:

Editor "Christian Herald"

Over many localities a tide of irreligion is sweeping, and the question is asked, what is the cause of such a lamentable state of affairs? In many places it may be traced to the inconsistent living of professors of religion—those whose actions show they love not God nor care what injury their bad example brings upon the church.

A young man, living some miles from here, was spoken to lately about the importance of giving up the intoxicating cup and becoming a Christian. His response was that every man who belonged to the church in the place where he lived had met with him in the public barroom and drank intoxicating liquor as freely as he did himself.

Another young man, who has lately become an infidel, was also turned against the church through the same cause. This proves how important it is that we make straight paths for our feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way (Heb. 12:13).

Another inconsistency which kills out religion is the amusement of the dance. This banishes all serious feeling, frequently leads into bad company, and in truly spiritual churches is looked upon as Satan's right hand help in leading souls into the downward path. A young lady, professing religion, went to a dance, and, while there, inquired of her partner, "Are you a Christian?" "I am not," he replied; "and neither are you or you would not be here." Worldlings are keen judges as to what is consistency.

Another cause of the deadness in some churches is, many of the members were never truly converted. During revival services they became serious and asked for prayers, but did not seek and find heart-union with Christ. There is a great want of thoroughness in this matter. People who are left property always search the registry office records to make sure they have an indisputable claim to it, but these same individuals rest contented with a sham title when connected with mansions in the skies.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

stands and not one tittle of it passes away, will not Sunday-keepers be punished for disregarding the command to keep the seventh day holy?

There is not the slightest danger of such punishment. There are many Old Testament laws that were not intended to be permanent and are not kept, such as the law of circumcision, the dietary laws, the laws relating to sacrifice etc. Christians honor their Lord by keeping holy the day on which he rose from the dead, and they who honor the Son will be honored by the Father.

Reader. Is it right for a minister of the Gospel to join a golf club composed of sceptics and infidels?

The tone of the question conveys to us the impression that it is put in the wrong spirit. A minister is certainly entitled to recreative exercise as well as other men, and there is nothing in golf that would tend to disqualify him. But how can you know that the persons with whom he associates are sceptics and infidels? Is such a conclusion justifiable? On the other hand, no minister who values his opportunities and appreciates the importance of retaining the respect of the community in which he lives, will assume any role, either in business or pleasure, which may cause him to forfeit that respect or may weaken his spiritual influence among them. He will remember the dignified and sacred office to which he is called, and will endeavor to so arrange his life and actions that the whole will be in harmony.

D. E. L., Richmond, Ind. Can a man be converted without receiving the Holy Spirit? Why do Christian people speak of it as a subsequent experience?

Conversion is the work of the Holy Spirit. In that sense every man who is converted receives the Spirit. There is, however, another sense in which there is a new reception. The Christian needs new grace from day to day that he may become more like Christ. He needs power to live the Christ-life in the world, to work for Christ and to live a holy life. This the Holy Spirit gives, and there are times of prayer and under the preaching of the Gospel when this power and unction come in unusual measure. God promises to give the Holy Spirit to those who ask him, and he keeps his promise, but the asking must be sincere and earnest.

Mrs. M. H. L., Bristol, Tex. Please give your views on entertainments in Sabbath Schools such as Bible scenes, the nativity, etc. One of our Sabbath Schools has acted the scene mentioned and some were opposed to it.

There need be nothing objectionable in the presentation of Bible scenes, illuminated Old and New Testament views, tableaux, etc., for Sunday Schools, provided the subjects are wisely chosen and properly presented. Indeed, they may be very helpful in assisting the young to an artistic conception of the Bible stories. There are, however, some scenes which it would be distinctly irreverent to present, and these we need hardly indicate. Acting, or dramatic presentation, in such cases, is not advisable; the silent figures tell their own story. A week day afternoon or evening should invariably be chosen for such gatherings.

M. J. B., Waterbury, Ct. I see in The Sun a letter asserting that the existence of Jesus Christ was unknown to the early writers and historians, and that the story of the Gospels is therefore unsupported by external evidence.

The statement is not well founded. Tacitus (about A.D. 60) and Suetonius (about A.D. 71), two eminent historians, both refer to Christ in their writings. Tacitus expressly adds: "He was put to death under Pontius Pilate, who was Procurator of Judea, in the reign of Tiberius." Pliny (A.D. 61), the intimate friend of both, and who was employed in Trajan's time in persecuting the Christians, wrote a full account of them to that potentate. Marcus Antonius (A.D. 121), who wrote a few years after Pliny, mentions the Christians and commends "their resolute and obstinate contempt of death." Epictetus (A.D. 50) makes an indirect reference to them as Galileans who "despised the rage of their armed enemies." These were all Pagan writers. Besides, we have copious reference to Christianity and its founder in the writings of Justin Martyr (beginning of second century), Tertullian (A. D. 160), and Minutius Felix, all proving that there were great numbers of men, very shortly after the time when Christ lived on earth, who professed his religion and endured hardships, persecution and even death for his sake. In addition to the foregoing, we might mention Lucian (early part second century), who wrote a sharp attack on the Christianized Jews, upbraiding them in sarcastic terms for deserting the ancient deities and worshiping "a crucified person"—the latter being the phrase by which Jesus was designated in some of the early Jewish writings. Spartian tells us that Alexander Severus thought so highly of Christ that he would have built a temple to him had not his pagan subjects opposed it. Porphyry (A.D. 233), another enemy of Christianity, acknowledged Christ's existence, but deemed him only "a wise and pious man, approved by the gods and taken up into heaven for his distinguished virtues." We might add to these a number of eminent Christian writers of the early Church, whose authenticity is unquestionable, but what we have already given sufficiently disposes of the charge that the existence of Christ was not recognized by the men who are the acknowledged historians of his day and epoch.

BAR AND LOBSTER FISHING IN TROPICAL ISLANDS

In the lowlands on the southern side of Porto Rico, where travelers have often encountered scenes like this, lobster fishing is a great industry. Receding tides leave lobsters and crabs in pockets formed by shells and rocks, and it is an easy task to capture them. Women come to market, carrying great baskets on their heads, filled with lobsters. American occupation gave a fresh impulse to the industry, this variety of sea-food being in demand for the table, in the army and in private homes.

C. G. C., Vincennes, Ind. Is there any Scripture which prohibits a person from preaching if he has the necessary grace and qualifications? Must he be ordained first?

We know of no such passage. Many men have preached the Gospel without being ordained. The late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, was a conspicuous instance. At the same time, the Epistles of Paul to Timothy and Titus and several passages in the Acts show that ordination was practised in apostolic times. There is, therefore, Scriptural authority for it. It has, besides, a practical advantage. If any man could become a minister without the consent or approval of the other ministers of his communion, he might preach heterodox doctrine and lead the people astray. His ordination indicates that in the opinion of other ministers he is fit to teach and preach.

C. W. L., Glengarry, W. Va. What is meant by laying up "treasure in heaven, where neither moth nor rust corrupt, nor thieves break through nor steal?"

Treasures in the East (to which Jesus referred in Matt. 6: 19) usually consisted partly of garments, which were liable to be consumed by moths, metals, were liable to depreciate through the action of rust. The "treasures in heaven" referred to in the twentieth verse, are faith, justice, mercy, and all the beautiful and gracious qualities that spring up in the heart as the result of Christ's abiding presence there. These are the imperishable riches. (See Luke

No person is responsible for thoughts that less so in your case. You would, however, be responsible for welcoming and cherishing them. We infer from your letter, that you get them out of your mind as speedily as possible and that is right. To dwell on them, would be to pollute the mind and to sap your up some study or occupation, which would be delightful to you and take your attention. When these bad thoughts come, you would then have pure ones that you could turn to instantly and the bad ones would depart. Be kind; avoid idleness and reverie. Avoid books and pictures and society which would suggest evil thoughts. Above all things, pray God to cleanse your heart and keep you from evil. If you follow this advice, you will soon cease to be troubled with evil thoughts. They do not persist in coming where they are not welcome and where a sincere effort is made to avoid them.

Reader, Titusville, Pa. I work in a drug store, where we have arranged with the other three local drug stores to keep open every fourth Sunday, one each week. My employer is a Christian and tries hard to do what is right. Every Sunday, when we keep open, we sell cigars and soda water, and this I feel to be wrong, although my employer never thought of it in that way. What do you think about it?

While it is doubtless a humane and necessary work to keep at least one drug store open in a community on Sunday, for the relief of suffering, the selling of such articles as you mention does not come under the same category. If you direct your employer's attention to it, he, being a Christian as you state, will no doubt order it discontinued.

Let him do precisely as he thinks best; there is no law in the case. The Chrisitan is not under law, and he is unwise if he tries to subject himself to it. If he can afford it, let him give a fifth or a third of his income to the Lord. There is no need to limit his gifts to a tenth.

He intended the verses, it is said, as an argument against the doctrine of the need of entire sanctification. It was first published in The Gospel Magazine and attracted more attention than all the other writings of Toplady. It is said that no other hymn in the English language has taken so broad and firm a grasp on the Christian heart.

... Japan Coming to Christ ...

A Great Religious Change Impending in the Mikado's Empire—The Truth About the Official Investigation into Christianity

FROM A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

THE Japanese have two religions: Shinto and Buddhist. Shintoists worship nature and their ancestors, and they have numerous gods and godesses. Shinto is a Chinese word and means: "The way of the gods."

A BUDDHIST PRIEST

Buddhism was introduced from Korea at the middle of the sixth century. It originates in India and is known to have existed there over 2,400 years ago. The Buddhists worship Buddha and many deities besides. These two religions through long association, have become greatly intermingled, and Buddhist priests have performed the service in Shinto temples for centuries.

After the discovery of Japan by the Portuguese in 1542, there was an effort to make proselytes in Japan for the Roman Catholic Church. Forty years afterwards, there began a persecution of the Christians (then small in number) by the followers of the two original religions, and in 1624 the land was closed to foreign trade, all missionaries were expelled from the country, and Christianity was prohibited.

Commodore Perry, in 1853, with his fleet, in the name of the United States demanded of the Japanese government a discontinuation of its isolation, and in consequence of this demand certain ports of that country were reopened to foreign trade, and the work of converting the Japanese to Christianity was resumed. Although the missionaries encountered numerous difficulties through the aggressive policy of the Buddhists and Shintoists, the good work went steadily on. A rough estimate of the number of the followers of the Christian religion in Japan to-day would place the same at about 100,000. Japan has to-day about 43,000,000 inhabitants.

In 1868, the Mikado's authority, which was for centuries only nominal, was restored, and it was his intention to establish Shintoism as the national religion. This, however, was found very difficult on account of the influence of the Buddhist priests. In 1874 the heads of the five largest Buddhist temples met, to consider the proposal of the government to abolish the Buddhist religion. They stated that there were several hundred thousand priests employed by the Buddhist churches who would have to look for some other occupation to make a living, and this would naturally result in a state of poverty among the working-class, as there was no room for so many additional farmers, laborers or fishermen. They decided against the proposal of the government to abolish the Buddhist religion.

A short time ago articles appeared in some American newspapers, according to which the Japanese government had sent a commission to Europe and America to study the effects of the Christian religion, and report on the advisability of adopting the same officially for Japan. Mr. T. Kato, the late Minister of the Japanese empire to the Court of St. James, with whom I had the pleasure of traveling from America to Japan, stated to me, upon my inquiry, that he had been advised in London by his home government, some time ago, that a representative of the latter would shortly call on him in London, in order to ask his assistance for his work, which would be to investigate the general effects of the Christian religion in England, and to report on the same. Mr. Kato told me, however, that this official had not yet made his appearance in London, and he felt disposed to believe that he had not been sent at all.

PRIESTS AND POSTURERS IN A BUDDHIST TEMPLE AT NARA

THE ROW OF 100 IDOLS AT NIKKO, JAPAN

Mr. G. Coates, Consul-General of the German empire for Tokio and Yokohama, with whom I became acquainted, expressed the opinion that various agents of the Japanese empire had really visited Europe and America, but that they had not found the condition of the people much better than in Japan. They had discovered just as much fraud and wickedness in those countries as existed in Japan, and therefore they did not recommend that the Christian religion should be declared official in Japan.

Mr. William J. Callahan, an American missionary, who has lived in the interior of Japan for the last six years, and is now on his way to Michigan on vacation, told me that the Buddhist priests were nowadays not preaching so much the doctrines of Buddhism, as they were opposing doctrines of Christianity. By doing so, they were calling the attention of many people to the Christian religion, who, under other circumstances, would not have known anything about it. He stated further that the statement that the Japanese government had sent representatives to various foreign countries, to study the Christian religion and its effect and influence on the people, was, in his opinion, simply newspaper rumor. He thought, however, that it would be in accord with recent Japanese tendencies if the government should eventually accept the Christian religion officially; but, even if this should not be the case, the present way of converting people to Christianity would show great results in the near future.

So far as I can see, the Japanese government do not seem to interfere with the practice of any religion whatsoever at the present time. I may state, however, that I found only the poorer classes of Japanese represented at the native temple services. The average Japanese worships practically every object, which, in his opinion, will be the means of benefiting him or protecting him from harm.

DECORATED CAR IN A RELIGIOUS CELEBRATION

A leading Yokohama paper, discussing the religious situation in Japan, has this utterance in a recent issue: "The four influential Japanese papers, the Jiji, Yorodzu, Sekaino Nippon, and Ohmoo Noron are all making desperate efforts to persuade the people that Christianity is on the decrease. Another journal of wide influence, the Hochi, however, takes a quite different view of the case. It intimates that the great national victory in the recent war has done much to demolish the claims of the old religions and that now "it cannot be doubted that Christianity is spreading gradually throughout the land. The recently held revival services in Tokio, which attracted immense crowds, were very significant." All the signs point to a great national religious movement in Japan, which must result in the decay of the ancient idol-worship and the general spread of Christianity.

Brotherly Love

Show me a church where there is love, writes Mr. D. L. Moody, and I will show you a church that is a power in the community. In Chicago a few years ago, a little boy attended a Sunday School I know of. When his parents moved to another part of the city the little fellow still attended the same Sunday School, although it meant a long, tiresome walk each way. A friend asked him why he went so far, and told him that there were plenty of others just as good nearer his home.

"They may be as good for others, but not for me," was his reply.

"Why not?" she asked.

"Because they love a fellow over there," he replied.

If only we could make the world believe that we loved them there would be fewer empty churches, and a smaller proportion of our population who never darken a church door. Let love replace duty in our church relations, and the world will soon be evangelized.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

. . . HEALTH RESORTS . . .

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, John 5: 2, 3:

A pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches. In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water.

OUTSIDE the city of Jerusalem there was a sanative watering-place, the popular resort for invalids. To this day, there is a dry basin of rock which shows that there may have been a pool there three hundred and sixty feet long, one hundred and thirty feet wide, and seventy-five feet deep. This pool was surrounded by five piazzas, or porches, or bathing-houses, where the patients tarried until the time when they were to step into the water. So far as reinvigoration was concerned, it must have been a Saratoga and a Long Branch on a small scale; a Leamington and a Brighton combined—medical and therapeutic. Tradition says that at a certain season of the year there was an officer of the government who would go down to that water and pour in it some healing quality, and after that the people would come and get the medication; but I prefer the plain statement of Scripture, that at a certain season an angel came down and stirred up or troubled the water; and then the people came and got the healing. That angel of God that stirred up the Judean watering-place had his counterpart in the angel of healing, who, in our day, steps into the mineral waters of Congress, or Sharon, or Sulphur Springs, or into the salt sea at Cape May and Nahant, where multitudes who are worn out with commercial and professional anxieties, as well as those who are afflicted with rheumatic, neuralgic, and splenetic diseases, go, and are cured by the thousands. These blessed Bethesdas are scattered all up and down our country.

We are at a season of the year when rail trains are laden with passengers and baggage on their way to the mountains and the lakes and the seashore. Multitudes of our citizens are away for a restorative absence. The city heats are pursuing the people with torch and fear of sunstroke. The long, silent halls of sumptuous hotels are all abuzz with excited arrivals. The antlers of Adirondack deer rattle under the shot of city sportsmen. The trout make fatal snap at the hook of adroit sportsmen, who toss their spotted brilliance into the game-basket. The baton of the orchestral leader taps the music-stand on the hotel green, and American life has put on festal array, and the rumbling of the ten-pin alley, and the crack of the ivory balls on the green-baized billiard-tables, and the jolting of the bar-room goblets, and the explosive uncorking of the champagne bottles, and the whirl and the rustle of the ball-room dance, and the clattering hoofs of the race-courses, and other signs of social dissipation attest that the season for the great American watering-places is in full play. Music! Flute, and drum, and cornet-a-piston, and clapping cymbals wake the echoes of the mountains. Glad am I that fagged-out American life, for the most part, has an opportunity to rest, and that nerves racked and destroyed will find a Bethesda. I believe in watering-places. They recuperate for active service many who were worn out with trouble or overwork. They are national restoratives. Let not the commercial firm begrudge the clerk, or the employer the journeyman, or the patient the physician, or the church its pastor, a season of inoccupation. Luther used to sport with his children; Edmund Burke used to caress his favorite horse; Thomas Chalmers, in the dark hour of the church's disruption, played kite for recreation—so I was told by his own daughter—and the busy Christ said to the busy apostles, "Come ye apart awhile into the desert and rest yourselves." And I have observed that they who do not know how to rest do not know how to work. But I have to declare this truth to-day, that some of our fashionable watering-places are the temporal and eternal destruction of "a multitude that no man can number;" and, amid the congratulations of this season, and the prospect of the departure of many of you for the country, I must utter a warning, plain, earnest, and unmistakable.

The first temptation that is apt to hover in this direction is to leave your piety at home. You will send the dog and cat and canary-bird to be well cared for somewhere else; but the temptation will be to leave your religion in the room with the blinds down and the door bolted, and then you will come back in the autumn to find that it is starved and suffocated, lying stretched on the rug, stark dead. There is no surplus of piety at the watering-places. I never knew any one to grow very rapidly in grace at the Catskill Mountain House, or Sharon Springs, or the Falls of Montmorency. It is generally the case that the Sabbath is more of a carousal than any other day, and there are Sunday walks, and Sunday rides, and Sunday excursions. Elders and deacons and ministers of religion, who are entirely consistent at home, sometimes when the Sabbath dawns on them at Niagara Falls or the White Mountains, take a day to themselves. If they go to the church, it is apt to be a sacred parade, and the discourse, instead of being a plain talk about the soul, is apt to be what is called a crack sermon—that is, some discourse picked out of the effusions of the year as the one most adapted to excite admiration; and in those churches, from the way the ladies hold their fans, you know that they are not so much impressed with the heat as with the picturesqueness of half disclosed features. Four puny souls stand in the organ loft and squall a tune that nobody knows, and worshipers, with two thousand dollars' worth of diamonds on the right hand, drop a cent into the poor-box, and then the benediction is pronounced and the farce is ended. The toughest thing I ever tried to do was to be good at a watering-place. The air is bewitched with the "world, the flesh and the devil." There are Christians who, in three or four weeks in such a place, have had such terrible rents made in their Christian robe, that they had to keep darning it until Christmas to get it mended.

The health of a great many people makes an annual visit to some mineral spring an absolute necessity; but take your Bible along with you, and take an hour for secret prayer every day, though you be surrounded by guffaw and saturnalia. Keep holy the Sabbath, though they deride you as a bigoted Puritan. Stand off from gambling hells and those other institutions which propose to imitate on this side the water the iniquities of Baden-Baden. Let your moral and your immortal health keep pace with your physical recuperation, and remember that all the sulphur and chalybeate springs cannot do you so much good as the healing, perennial flood that breaks forth from the "Rock of Ages." This may be your last summer. If so, make it a fit vestibule of heaven.

Another temptation hovering around nearly all our watering-places is the horse-racing business. We all admire the horse, but we do not think that its beauty or speed ought to be cultured at the expense of human degradation. The horse-race is not of such importance as the human race. The Bible intimates that a man is better than a sheep, and I suppose he is better than a horse, though, like Job's stallion, his neck be clothed with thunder. Horse-races in olden times were under the ban of Christian power, and in our day the same institution has come up under fictitious names. And it is called a "Summer Meeting," almost suggestive of positive religious exercises. And it is called an "Agricultural Fair," suggestive of everything that is improving in the art of farming. But under these deceptive titles are the same cheating and the same betting and the same drunkenness and the same vagabondage and the same abomination that were to be found under the old horse-racing system.

I never knew a man yet who could give himself to the pleasures of the turf for a long reach of time and not be battered in morals. They hook up their spanking team and put on their sporting cap and light their cigar and take the reins and dash down on the road to perdition! The great day at Saratoga and Brighton Beach and Cape May and nearly all the other watering-places is the day of the races. The hotels are thronged, every kind of equipage is taken up at an almost fabulous price; and there are many respectable people mingling with jockeys and gamblers and libertines and foul-mouthed men and flashy women. The bartender stirs up the brandy smash. The bets run high. The greenhorns, supposing all is fair, put in their money soon enough to lose it. Three weeks before the race takes place the struggle is decided, and the men in the secret know on which steed to bet their money. The men on the horses riding around, long ago arranged who shall win. Leaning from the stand, or from the carriage, are men and women so absorbed in the struggle of bone and muscle and mettle that they make a grand harvest for the pickpockets, who carry off the pocket-books and the portemonnaies. Men looking on see only a string of horses with their riders flying around the ring; but there is many a man on that stand whose honor and domestic happiness and fortune—white mane, white foot, white flank—are in the ring, racing with inebriety and with fraud and with profanity and with ruin—black neck, black foot, black flank. Neck and neck go the leaders in that moral Epsom. White horse of honor; black horse of ruin. Death says: "I will bet on the black horse." Spectator says: "I will bet on the white horse." The white horse of honor a little way ahead. The black horse of ruin, Satan mounted, all the time gaining on him. Spectator breathless. They put on the lash, dig in the spurs. There! They are past the stand. Sure. Just as I expected it. The black horse of ruin has won the race, and all the galleries of darkness "Huzza! huzza!" and the devils come in to pick up their wagers. Ah, my friends, have nothing to do with horse-racing dissipations this summer.

Long ago the English government got through looking to the turf for the dragoon and the light-cavalry horse. They found out that the turf depreciates the stock; and it is worse yet for men. Thomas Hughes, the member of Parliament, and the author known all the world over, hearing that a new turf enterprise was being started in this country, wrote a letter in which he said, "Heaven help you, then; for of all the cankers of our old civilization there is nothing in this country approaching in unblushing meanness, in rascality holding its head high, to this belauded institution of the British turf." Another famous sportsman writes: "How many fine domains have been shared among these hosts of rapacious sharks during the last two hundred years; and unless the system be altered, how many more are doomed to fall into the same gulf!" With the bull-fights of Spain and the bear-baitings of the pit, may the Lord God annihilate the infamous and accursed horse-racing of England and America!

I go further and speak of another temptation that hovers over the watering-place; and that is the temptation to sacrifice physical strength. The modern Bethesda, just like this Bethesda of the text, was intended to recuperate the physical health; and yet how many come from the watering-places their health absolutely destroyed! City simpletons boasting of having imbibed twenty glasses of Congress water before breakfast. Families, accustomed to go to bed at ten o'clock at night, gossiping until one or two o'clock in the morning. Dyspeptics, weak and carping about their health, mingling nervousness and boisterousness, and consuming, with the gayest, time set up all their notes of lamentation and protest. Delicate women and heedless young men throwing themselves into vertigo and catalepsy. Thousands of men and women coming back from our watering-places in the autumn with the foundations laid for ailments that will last them all their life long. You know as well as I do that this is the simple truth. In the summer, you say to your good health: "Good-by; I am going to have a gay time now for a little while; I will be very glad to see you again in the autumn." Then in the autumn when you are hard at work in your office, or store, or shop, or counting-room, Good Health will come in and say: "Good-by; I am going." You say: "Where are you going?" "Oh," says Good Health, "I am going to take a vacation." It is a poor rule that will not work both ways, and your good health will leave you choleric and splenetic and exhausted. You coquetted with your good health in the summer-time, and your good health is coquetting with you in the winter-time. A fragment of Paul's charge to the jailer would be an appropriate inscription for the hotel register in every watering-place: "Do thyself no harm."

Another temptation hovering around the watering-place is the formation of hasty and life-long alliances. The watering-places are responsible for more of the domestic infelicities of this country than nearly all other things combined. Society is so artificial there that no sure judgment of character can be formed. They who form companionships amid such circumstances go into a lottery where there are twenty blanks to one prize. In the severe tug of life you want more than glitter and splash. Life is not a ball-room, where the music decides the step, and bow and prance and graceful swing of long train can make up for strong common sense. You might as well go among the gaily-painted yachts of a summer regatta to find war vessels, as to go among the light spray of the summer watering-place to find character that can stand the test of the great struggle of human life. In the battle of life you want a stronger weapon than a lace fan or a croquet mallet. The load of life is so heavy, that in order to draw it you want a team stronger than that made up of a masculine grasshopper and a feminine butterfly. If there is any man in the community who excites my contempt, and who ought to excite the contempt of every man and woman, it is the soft-handed, soft-headed dude, who, perfumed until the air is actually sick, spends his summer in striking killing attitudes, and waving sentimental adieux, and talking infinitesimal nothings, and finding his heaven in the set of a lavender kid glove. Boots as tight as an inquisition. Two hours of consummate skill exhibited in the tie of a flashing cravat. His conversation made up of "Ahs!" and "Ohs!" and "He hes!"

There is only one counterpart to such a man as that, and that is the frothy young woman at the watering-place: her conversation made up of French moonshine; what she has in her head only equalled by what she has on her back; useless ever since she was born, and to be useless until she is dead, unless she becomes an intelligent Christian. We may admire music and fair faces and graceful step; but amid the heartlessness and the inflation and the fantastic influences of our modern watering-places, beware how you make life-long covenants.

Another temptation that hovers over the watering-place is that of baneful literature. Almost every one starting off for the summer takes some reading matter. It is a book out of the library, or off the bookstand, or bought of the boy hawking books through the cars. I really believe there is more pestiferous trash read among the intelligent classes in July and August than in all the other ten months of the year. Men and women who at home would not be satisfied with a book that was not really sensible, I find sitting on hotel piazza, or under the trees, reading books the index of which would make them blush if they knew that you knew what the book was. "Oh," they say, "you must have intellectual recreation." Yes. There is no need that you take along to a watering-place "Hamilton's Metaphysics," or some ponderous discourse on the eternal decrees, or "Faraday's Philosophy." There are many easy books that are good. You might as well say, "I propose now to give a little rest to my digestive organs, and instead of eating heavy meat and vegetables, I will, for a little while, take lighter food—a little strychnine and a few grains of rats bane." Literary poison in August is as bad as literary poison in December. Mark that. Do not let the frogs of a corrupt printing-press jump into your Saratoga trunk or White Mountain valise. Are there not good books that are easy to read—books of entertaining travel; books of congenial history; books of pure fun; books of fine engraving; books that will rest the mind as well as purify the heart and elevate the whole life? There will not be an hour between this and your death when you can afford to read a book lacking in moral principle.

Another temptation hovering all around our watering-places is intoxicating beverages. At the close of the ten-pin or billiard game, they tipple. At the close of the cotillion, they tipple. Seated on the piazza cooling themselves off, they tipple. The tinged glasses come around with bright straws, and they tipple. First, they take "light wines," as they call them; but "light wines" are heavy enough to debase the appetite. There is not a very long road between champagne at five dollars a bottle and whiskey at ten cents a glass. Satan has three or four grades down which he takes men to destruction. One man he takes up, and through one spree pitches him into eternal darkness. That is a rare case. Satan will take a man to a descent at an angle about like the Pennsylvania coal-shoot or the Mount Washington rail track and shove him off. But that is very rare. When a man goes down to destruction, Satan brings him to a plane. It is almost a level. The depression is so slight that you can hardly see it. The man does not actually know that he is on the down grade, and it tips only a little toward darkness—just a little. And the first mile it is claret, and the second mile it is sherry, and the third mile it is punch, and the fourth mile it is ale, and the fifth mile it is whiskey, and the sixth mile it is brandy, and then it gets steeper and steeper and steeper, until it is impossible to stop. "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

Whether you tarry at home—which will be quite as safe, and perhaps quite as comfortable—or go into the country, arm yourself against temptation. The grace of God is the only safe shelter, whether in town or country.

In California, in five minutes, I walked around and saw ten fountains all bubbling up, and they were all different; and in five minutes I can go through this Bible parterre and find you fifty bright, sparkling fountains bubbling up into eternal life—healing and therapeutic. A chemist will go to one of these summer watering-places and take the water, and analyze it, and tell you that it contains so much of iron, and so much of soda, and so much of lime, and so much of magnesia. I come to this Gospel well, this living fountain, and analyze the water; and I find that its ingredients are peace, pardon, forgiveness, hope, comfort, life, heaven. "Ho, everyone that thirsteth, come ye" to this watering-place. Crowd around this Bethesda. O you sick, you lame, you dying—crowd around this Bethesda.

A Summer Gospel Campaign

Philadelphia's Non-Church-Going Multitudes Hear the Word of Life Preached Under Canvas—Remarkable Evangelistic Movement

An evangelistic movement, having several novel features, is meeting with large success in Philadelphia at the present time. The extent of the enterprise, the fruits gathered, the standing of the men behind the movement and the story of its inception make a narrative of considerable interest.

Mr. Moody is in large part responsible for the movement. Last spring he addressed a meeting of the Philadelphia Presbyterian Social Union, a laymen's organization, and he made a strong plea for the evangelistic work in behalf of the non-church-goers during the summer. Although most of the pastors leave the town at this time, and many of the churches close their doors, there are, nevertheless, tens of thousands of persons who do not get away from the city, and who, Mr. Moody declared, can best be reached by the Gospel during the summer. He urged that a committee of laymen be formed, similar to that which has been in existence in Glasgow for twenty-five years past, for the purpose of prosecuting evangelistic work. He urged it as altogether reasonable that $100,000 be spent this summer by the business men present for the purpose of preaching the Gospel to the masses of Philadelphia. The address, a most moving one, took strong hold of the two or three hundred business men present, and as an outcome of the meeting a joint committee was appointed, representing the Social Union and the Philadelphia Presbyteries.

The Chairman of this committee is Mr. John H. Converse, the head of the famous Baldwin Locomotive Works, and Philadelphia's leading citizen; the Treasurer is another prominent business man, Mr. William H. Scott; the General Secretary is Rev. James B. Ely, a missionary to India, who is sojourning in the city for a few months. On the committee are many men prominent in public affairs in Philadelphia—all of them workers in Presbyterian churches.

The movement was broadly planned and is being carefully conducted. Early in July six large tents were put in operation at stragetic points throughout the city. The tents hold from four to eight hundred persons each, and every night the outside of every tent is lined with a company of interested listeners.

As speakers in the meetings, a number of the leading evangelists and preachers of the country were secured. Some of them have been working in the tents for several weeks, and some, especially preachers, can give only a few days or a few weeks. The very best men that the magnitude of the work or the money of the committee can command, were called into service. Few evangelistic movements have been able to secure the services of so many noted men. For example, among the speakers thus far have been Rev. A. C. Dixon, D.D., of Brooklyn; Rev. David James Burrell, D.D., of New York; Rev. William Patterson, of Cooke's Presbyterian Church, Toronto, the largest church in Canada; Rev. H. M. Wharton, D.D., of Baltimore; Rev. John F. Carson, D.D., of Brooklyn; Rev. L. W. Munhall, Rev. George C. Needham, Rev. Thomas Needham and Rev. Ford C. Ottmann, evangelists. These men have been spread over the city as effectively as possible. At times the tents themselves are moved from place to place. The endeavor is by this means to spread the influence of the meetings as widely as possible.

But not only by the extent of the work and the character of the speakers is this movement made noteworthy. It is somewhat singular, in that it is a denominational enterprise, and that it has been projected and is in large part conducted by laymen. One half of the executive committee consists of clergymen; yet most of the active work is done by business men, and the influence of their executive ability is felt in every part of the movement. There is a system and thoroughness about all the operations that is delightful and noteworthy.

The Presbyterian churches in the neighborhood of each tent are drawn upon for workers on the sub-committees. Since the meetings are under the care of the Presbyterian churches, the latter naturally feel a responsibility for them that might be lacking in a general movement. Consequently little difficulty has been experienced in securing men and women for the chorus, which is a feature of each service, for the work of invitation, ushering and dealing with inquirers. Thousands of printed invitations are distributed weekly, and, in addition, personal invitations are given by neighborhood visitors. The services are well advertised also by means of posters and newspaper notices, so that their direct influence upon the city has been considerable.

The tents are equipped as completely as consecrated brains and money can equip them. The thoroughness of this preparation may be inferred from the fact that in some of the tents provision is even made for the care of bicycles.

The effect of the meetings upon the churches has been most marked. Christians have been quickened to a new sense of responsibility for the unsaved, and there is evidence that very many of the church members, who attend the services regularly, take with them unconverted friends and neighbors. Possibly, the most encouraging feature of the work, has been the number of non-church-goers reached. From all the tents come reports of conversions of persons who have not attended church services for many years. There are many requests for prayer, and many conversions in the meetings held nightly. The evangelists say that they have never seen a more fruitful or prosperous Gospel crusade. There is a decided note of jubilation in the Monday meeting of workers in the Witherspoon Building.

The committee expects to continue the tent-meetings well into September, if not until October.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Rebuilding the Temple

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 3. Ezra 3 : 10 ; 4 : 5

Golden Text, I. Cor. 3 : 17

THE climax of God's judgment upon his people was the destruction of the temple at Jerusalem. "Our holy and our beautiful house, where our fathers worshipped thee." The first object in the proclamation of Cyrus was to build a house in Jerusalem for "the Lord the God of heaven." But God had something more in hand than the mere erection of a building. Cyrus indeed made his proclamation; God had raised him up for that purpose. But the Lord had other instruments and other aims. There was the prophet Zechariah, who was given to see "a candlestick all of gold" (Zech. 4 : 2), a light which should lighten the nation and be a testimony to the God of Israel. And he saw seven lamps in the candlestick and two olive trees which would supply the lamps with oil, and the Lord showed him "These be the sons of oil that stand by the Lord of the whole earth" (Zech. 4 : 14). God had two men who stood by him, men whose personal interests were made subservient to the interests of their God: these were men on whom he could count in these critical days, when it meant much that a true standard of the fear of God should be set up and maintained from those who had come back from the captivity.

These two men were Jeshua, the son of Jozadak, the priest, and Zerubbabel, the son of Shealtiel, the governor. These men commenced the work after the heart of God. They began with the altar. Unless communion with God were restored, on the ground of the offered and accepted sacrifice, what good could it be to set up the temple walls? What a lesson for the builders of churches and chapels, mission rooms, etc., in the present day! God "dwelleth not in temples made with hands," but in living temples: the bodies of those who worship him. "Know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you which ye have of God, and ye are not your own (I. Cor. 6 : 19, 20). God can dispense with buildings, if he has living temples to dwell in; gorgeous Christian churches where the worshipers are not filled with the living God, are but an offence to and a mockery to him who dwells not in such temples. Let a living church of those who "worship him in spirit and in truth" exist; then will God's anointed ones, his sons of oil, understand him, and seek to go about the work in his fashion, not in man's: therefore "they set up the altar upon its base and offered burnt-offerings."

Under the blessing and inspiration of renewed national communion with God, they set about the work of rebuilding. Naturally the first thing was to act upon the grant of timber made by Cyrus, and thus the material was prepared to set masons and carpenters to work. The work was only actually commenced in the second month of the second year of their emancipation, and then the Levites from twenty years old and upward were appointed to the oversight of the work of the house of the Lord. And in this work Jeshua and his family took the lead, superintending the workmen. When true men of God who value the altar of the Lord, superintend the workmen who are engaged on a building, the work is accompanied by prayer, and the hand of the Lord is with them. How many a church has been built where no priestly heart has borne up continually to God the workmen employed in it, and they have come and gone, done their work and earned their wages, without entering upon any acquaintance with the God who is there to be worshiped, or the Saviour who died for them.

The laying of the foundation was of course a great occasion. When the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the Lord, they set the priests in their apparel with trumpets, and the Levites, the sons of Asaph with cymbals, to praise the Lord, after the order of David, the king of Israel (see I. Chron. 15 : 16-22). Doubtless David well understood music, but music was not the first thing with him, but "singing and making melody with your heart to the Lord" (Eph. 5: 19), for David's appointment of his singers was that with all their instruments they should lift up "the voice with joy." How often in churches one sees and feels that the choir is doing only mechanical work, rightly rendering the music, but not lifting up the heart to God. Would not the most discordant music please him better if it were the only way by which hearts in accord with his could utter praises which were dictated by the Holy Spirit's revelation of Christ to their hearts?

"THEY SET THE PRIESTS IN THEIR APPAREL WITH TRUMPETS"

They sang one to another in praising and giving thanks to the Lord, saying, "For he is good and his mercy endureth forever toward Israel. And all the people shouted with a great shout, when they praised the Lord, because the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid. "Whoso offereth praise honoreth me, and prepareth a way that I may show him salvation of God" (Ps. 50: 23, R. V. marg.). Praise turns our eyes away from ourselves to God, and thus prepares the way for him to show us the interpretation of things which we cannot understand. The joy of the people was not in their own personal release from captivity, but that the house of the Lord was arising again from the dust. The shout of the people was as welcome to God as were the songs of the singers.

But all were not rejoicing. The larger number of the returned captives had been born in Babylon, and to them it was unmixed joy to be restored to the land of their fathers, but "many of the priests and Levites and heads of the fathers' houses, the old men that had seen the first house standing on its foundation, when this house was before their eyes (R. V. marg.), wept with a loud voice." The memory of the sin of their people and the hardness of their fathers' hearts which would not hear the voice of his prophets, was a painful remembrance to them. Thus with mingled feelings, for "the people could not discern the noise of the shout of joy from the noise of the weeping of the people," they laid the foundation. "For the people shouted with a loud shout, and the noise was heard afar off." The one candlestick all of gold, the witness before the nations that Jehovah is God, was being set up once more. What must this have been to the heart of God, and to the hearts of these children of Israel!

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

MANY months must have been occupied in the journey of the returning Hebrews from Babylon to Jerusalem. If they took the desert way, the distance was eight hundred miles; and if they took the easier way, to the north of Syria, in which they would have less difficulty in procuring food, the distance was still longer. It differed from the Exodus from Egypt in there being no enemy behind them and no foe to be encountered in Palestine. But it was a dreary end to their journey. The overthrown walls, the empty houses and the charred and blackened ruins of the Temple, were sad evidences of the desolation of the land. They appear to have settled in Jerusalem and the adjacent cities, which, alone, the decree of Cyrus gave them the right to occupy. Their commission was to "build the house of the Lord God of Israel: he is the God which is in Jerusalem." But they had learned much during their sojourn in Babylon. They had abandoned idolatry, for one thing, and they never again reverted to it. They had learned, too, that it was possible to worship God without a Temple, as they had done in Babylon. Accordingly they erected an altar on the bare rock and, without waiting for the building of the new Temple, offered sacrifices. It was fifty years since the smoke of sacrifice had ascended from the summit of Mount Moriah, and we can understand how the sight must have gladdened the hearts of priests and people.

The foundation of the Temple. The ceremony of laying this stone was as imposing as it could be made. The priests in their robes, blowing on the trumpets, and the Levites clapping their cymbals, and the people shouting and singing, combined to make the occasion memorable. But it had naturally its element of sadness. The old men who could remember Solomon's Temple realized how poor in comparison was the richest house they could hope to build. But there was no need for them to weep, unless it was for the national sin which had led to the destruction of the former house. The new [illegible] would be good enough for the purpose, and a sum of at least four hundred thousand dollars was in hand for material [illegible]. A gentleman coming to [illegible] a few years ago sought out an old friend at whose grand mansion on Fifth Avenue he stayed on a former visit. He found him now occupying a flat in a side street and expected that he would be depressed by the change in his domicile. To his surprise his friend greeted him with greater cheerfulness than before. "I am a great deal happier now," he said, in explanation. "My friends think I am ruined, but I am saved. The business I was in was ruining souls, and I am glad I am rid of it. There was the taint of blood on every dollar I made. I should never have had the moral courage to give it up; but I lost it, and I am glad. I would not be in it again and bear the reproach of my conscience for millions of dollars. I am earning enough by honest labor to pay my way, and that is enough for me. Thank God my hands are clean now."

Let us build with you. It was a friendly offer, and the returned exiles certainly needed help. Why, then, would they not accept this friendly overture? The reason lay in the character, origin and faith of the people who made it. They were people who had been brought to the country more than a hundred years before to take the place of the ten tribes. They were idolaters, but having the idea common at that time that every country had its peculiar God, they had, as a matter of prudence, worshiped the God of the country in which they had come to settle. He was not their God, but he might do them harm if they lived in his country without worshiping him. (See II. Kings 17: 24-26). What had they in common with these returned Hebrews? If they were allowed to help in building the temple, they might afterwards claim a share in the management of it, might even want to bring their idols into it. Not long ago a Young Men's Christian Association in a country town was anxious to build a gymnasium. It was very difficult to raise the money. Some wealthy young men offered to as[illegible] with large [illegible], if they were admitted to membership. The rules, however, excluded them because they were men of notoriously irregular life. So the rules were changed to permit the large givers to become members. By and bye their conduct so disgusted the regular members that many of the latter withdrew. Then more irreligious young men were admitted, until finally the wicked element was the stronger, and they could carry their proposal to hold athletic contests on Sunday and in other ways make the name of "Christian" a by-word in the town.

Ye have nothing to do with us. The answer looks churlish and the Jews have been blamed for their refusal. It brought them serious trouble. The men so rebuffed protested to the king and the building of the temple was delayed for over fifteen years by the opposition that ensued. But the Jews were right. All their misery had come from their association with the heathen. They had learned that lesson, at least, in their long exile, and they have never forgotten it to this day. Their very existence is the result of their exclusiveness. They would soon have been absorbed into other nations if they had not steadfastly resisted the process at the beginning. They could be friendly, but in matters of religion there could be no partnership. Christians are not always so careful. Some years ago a Christian girl listened to the suit of a godless young man. She was reluctant to marry him, but he promised so much, assured her that she should not be restrained from going to church, and should keep all her religious habits. She hoped, too, that she might be the means of his conversion, and finally, over-persuaded, she married him. For a time she was regular at church, but gradually she became indifferent. Her husband ridiculed her faith. Her children grew up to despise it. Gradually her own belief was undermined. There was nothing in her life to nurture it, and she at length abandoned it altogether.

Should a Church Accept a Saloon-keeper's Gift?

J. R. N's Letter of Inquiry Excites a Storm of Discussion—Many Condemn Such Gifts as "Blood-Money"—Others Would Accept

SELDOM has any letter to THE MAIL-BAG attracted such attention as the communication from J. R. N., a reader in Zanesville, O., which appeared in a recent issue. It will be remembered that the writer of that letter asked the question whether "a Christian church is justified in accepting a gift of money from a saloon-keeper, to be used in connection with its missionary and other spiritual work." We submitted the question to the judgment of our readers and invited a free and general expression of opinion. In response we have received a very large number of letters and as space limitations make it impossible to print all in this issue, we give below a portion of the answers in the order in which they were received:

Deaf Mute, Frederick, Md., writes:

The Bible says that the disciples were told that when they were invited to dine with a heathen, or one who worshiped idols. they could do so and partake of what was set before them, asking no questions for conscience's sake; but if the master of the house should say it was sacrificed or dedicated to his god or idol, they should not partake of the meal for their conscience's sake. If the saloon-keeper contributes towards supporting missionary and other spiritual works, I think the church would be justified in accepting the money without asking him where or how he got the money, etc., for conscience's sake; but should he say he got or could make money enough by selling liquor and would be able to help the church, it is better not to accept his offer.

Mrs. M. J. Manning, Chicago, writes:

God wants no money, to carry on his work, obtained through the sale of that which ruins both soul and body. There is no curse on our otherwise fair earth to-day that equals the liquor traffic, and any church ought not to take long to decide the matter.

Zenus Kingsberry, Brownsville, Vt., writes:

Saloon money is the price of broken hearts—of the life and happiness of God's little ones—men, women and children. Now, for the Christian church to take the price of blood and offer it to God in sacrifice to carry forward his work in saving men would simply be an insult. It falls below the integrity of the Pharisees in Christ's day. It was unlawful to put the price of blood into the treasury. Hence they bought the Potter's Field to bury strangers in.

W. J. Portwood, Germantown, Pa., writes:

I am not a believer in saloons, but in regard to receiving money from a saloon, I think is just as good as another store or a private house. The saloon had to sell in exchange for the money as another store would have to do. I think the church would be doing right in receiving the money—and not that alone, but it might be the means in time of saving the souls of the saloon-keeper's family.

T. H. C., Plainfield, writes:

Accept no saloon benefactions. It is blood money. It might, even remotely, be a bribe. It does put one under a kind of obligation to an illegal traffic. Far better to assist a saloon-keeper (if in distress or sickness), than to accept of him (while in active rum business), religious assistance. After years of acceptance, the Long Island Baptist Association decided to refuse to accept thereafter money paid for licensing a base traffic. I think other religious associations have followed the same course.

Jessie McD., Brooklyn, N. Y. Such gifts, being unconsecrated, and not given for the purpose of furthering God's glory, but man's vanity, must remain unblessed and should not be accepted.

A. D. A., Toledo. "Who art thou that judgest thy brother?" If men, once worldly, feel drawn to the Cross, shall we oppose a barrier? Are we to be the judge of the sincerity of their action, or is God? May it not be the turning-point, the spiritual crisis of their lives, which would be thrust back by our opposition into the old channels of sin, instead of entering upon the boundless sea of God's mercy?

Reader, Lexington, Ky. If we are to rule out all contributors to church purposes, who are engaged in business that are not to some folks' liking, we will very soon find that we are making a mistake. "The whole need no physician." We should take such people into the congregation and try to make good Christians of them, instead of beginning by shutting the door in their faces and flinging their gifts after them

J. B. M., Kalamazoo, Mich. Does it not tend to lower the spirituality of a church? Is it not conforming to the wishes of the world, getting support from the world? I believe that bad means deprave good ends, and that money obtained from the world neither blesses those who give, nor those who receive. It tends to make the church trust more in wordly gifts and less in God. On the other hand, it is contended that a considerable number of churches could not meet their financial obligations without such methods. I am a member of a Presbyterian church here, and heard the subject ably and warmly discussed by two members of the session, without being able to come to any agreement.

Mrs. H. Andrew, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

I say No, it is not right, because it is the price of blood, and I think God's people are not careful enough in this matter. I think, today, that is why our missionary fields lack money for their work, because they are not careful enough. If they would only ask, the dear Lord would open a way for Christian hearts to supply money for this work.

Henry D. Gordon, Washington, D. C., writes:

Take it! If this money had a soul, it would cry out from its uttermost depths: "Give me the opportunity! I have been forced into channels of darkness and evil! And now a ray of light and blessing beams on me. Oh, keep me not back." If we refuse the money because of evil channels through which it comes, shall we not refuse other money for the same cause? And is not all money in this sense more or less contaminated? Yes. Take it; delay not, lest it be forced back to promote the greatest source of crime and brutality. Take it, that it may expand the church, its soul-saving, its charities, its blessed missions, and glorify God who gave it. Do we not take the drunkards and the Magdalenes?

W. W. Hubbard, Philadelphia, writes:

How can a church innocently accept and use for the furtherance of the world's evangelization, money passed over the bar in the grog-shop? Impossible, for besides the fact that it would be the receiver of stolen goods, there is the added guilt of the knowledge that it was stolen. The voice of victimized maidenhood of abandoned wifehood, robbed womanhood and impoverished childhood cry out in anguish against such an apalling injustice. The anguish of lost character and dehumanized manhood, sound above the strife of nations against this dreadful sin. The ring of the thirty pieces of silver as Judas flung them down on the marble floor was music to his ear, as compared with the unutterable and unbearable torture of the voice of his remorseful conscience for having received the price of blood. If we have but a spark of conscience within us, can we fail to see at once in this not only blood money, but the price of a soul? In the name of the world's blessed Redeemer—quick—"Get thee behind me, Satan!"

M. I. Banks, Boston, Mass., writes:

See Matt. 27: 6. Money made by the sale of wine, liquors and beer, or by rent of buildings devoted to their sale, is assuredly "blood money," for it has destroyed the bodies and souls of men. Why think to use money by pulling down God's kingdom, to build it up again? No! God has enough followers, whose money is consecrated, for all his work, and they should think it their highest privilege to give to him "who giveth all." Nearly all the poverty in the world comes from the use of intoxicants, and thousands now "in comfortable circumstances," would be the rich men of their respective cities in a few years, if they would not spend a cent for liquors, wines or beer. Consecrated Christians should never use unconsecrated money. For God's use it should be "first fruits" and "wi thout blemish.'

Archie W. Ginzkey, Alma, Wis., writes:

I think it right to accept it for this reason: It is sure to be used as other people's gifts are, probably for tracts or Bibles or else for the support of a minister. By his gifts the saloon-keeper is getting more enemies, and the more enemies he has the better for Christianity.

W. S. Cain, Atchison, Kansas, writes:

Children here grow up accustomed to the practical sale of indulgences to sell liquor and keep vile resorts in violation of law. The excuse is that these evils cannot be suppressed and that the fines (practical license) raise revenue and keep such places under police surveillance. After having vainly tried to enforce the law, I have protested against existing usage, and as an effort to make the best of an evil we cannot suppress, have advocated the setting apart of monies raised by such fines to build homes for the fallen women and wrecks of men who follow in the train of these evils. I would accept, under present conditions, the saloonkeepers' money and expend it upon the victims of his patrons—the unfortunate wives and children.

T. F. Martin, Blair, Neb., writes:

Take the money and commend the giver for giving it. No good act should be frowned upon. We don't know the impulse that prompts good deeds, nor to what glorious results they may lead if encouraged.

W. B. Olmstead, Jackson, Mich, writes:

The evils of the saloon are so great and so entirely opposed to the Christian church, that it would seem inconsistent with the spirit of true separation from the world to accept money from such a source to carry on the Gospel.

Olyette Ellis, Windsor, Wis., writes:

If the pastor, deacons and members of your church voted to legalize the saloon business, your church need have no compunctions about accepting contributions from the saloon-keeper; for in granting license to make drunkards, paupers and criminals, you accepted his bribe and are therefore entitled to a portion of the "blood money."

J. B. Heisey, Lancaster, Pa., writes:

Take the money if you are not placed under obligations to favor his business. The Lord uses many different agencies to carry on his works.

C. T. Langeson, Hutchinson, Minn., writes:

The saloon is an open enemy to the home, and to the kingdom of God. The money coming from the saloon is the fruit of the ruin of men; to receive it as a gift for Christian work will be displeasing to God.

Another instalment of replies to J. R. N.'s problem will appear next week. We shall be pleased to hear from all who hold definite views on the subject, which is one that affects the welfare of every Christian church in the land.

A BIG RING-A-ROSY AT OUR CHILDREN'S HOME ON THE HUDSON

Our Children's Visitors

Philanthrophists, Missionaries and Educators call on Our Little Folks—A Letter

MANY visitors have found it interesting to call at our Children's Home this summer and to pass some pleasant hours with our little guests. Some visitors, seeing how happy the little ones are, feel drawn to ask that a child of the tenements may, through their instrumentality, share in the benefits of the Home. Almost without exception our visitors express themselves as debtors to the children for a happy and profitable experience. Mothers of the children spending a day at the Home are specially delighted. Missionaries and people engaged in philanthropic work generally find peculiar interest in going through the dormitories, and watching the children at play and at their meals. Some of our most appreciative visitors are teachers and kindergarteners. The following sketch, called "A Wood Ramble," written by Miss Coles, training teacher in the Kindergarten Department of the New York Normal College, will give our readers an idea of the affectionate responsiveness with which our little folks greet all who show friendly interest in them:

Strolling through the woods of Nyack Heights one morning recently, I met a large party of boys and girls from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Children's Home in charge of one of the teachers. We were soon friends, for we so often realize, changing the words of Solomon's proverb a little, "As in water face answereth to face," so the heart of a child answers to one who will be childlike.

There were opportunities for character study. We noticed how some children plucked with roots and all, the yellow daisy, a flower so easily observed, while others hunted carefully for the very delicate wild flowers, the little red stars not easily seen. We gratefully received their offerings of love.

The benefit of nature study in our public schools in developing habits of observation was noted with interest. We heard one child saying, "The centre of the yellow daisy is all little flowers." Great delight was manifested in the finding of some of last year's chestnut burrs; and a talk followed upon the downy home of the nut and its need of an outside spiny covering. A chestnut leaf was plucked, whereupon one little girl remarked, "We drew that in school." Genuine interest was manifested in comparing an elm with a chestnut leaf. "This is rough and this is smooth," exclaimed happy voices. "The chestnut is long and not so wide." How ready a little group were to promise to tell "teacher," when she might ask the question in the fall, "What are woods?" that it was a place "all shady and full of trees." One little girl said, "My teacher tells us of the woods," but in the child's face there seemed to be expressed the satisfaction that now she too could talk about woods.

We said good bye to our little friends with a heart made glad, because of the knowledge of the joy and happiness that is, in these summer days, entering the lives of these little ones. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Famine Follows Flood in Cyclone-Swept Porto Rico

2,000 DEAD AND OVER 100,000 HOMELESS AND STARVING

A Great Calamity Which Christian America can do Much to Soften — Our Government Directs Relief Measures — "The Christian Herald" Opens a Fund—Appeal of the Women's Aid Society of Porto Rico—An Opportunity for all to Help a Good Cause

OVER two thousand dead, and at least one hundred thousand men, women and children homeless, helpless and destitute—such is the appalling record of the cyclone which swept over Porto Rico on the night of August 8. It was one of the most destructive cyclones ever experienced in this hemisphere, and while it swept over the entire West Indian group, it expended its greatest violence on the devoted island of Porto Rico, which lay in the very centre of its path. Hundreds of dwellings were wrecked by the force of the wind, and nearly every vessel in the harbors and along the coast was swept to destruction. The rivers, swollen by torrential rains, and augmented by the great tides that rolled in from the sea, became like great lakes, and inundated towns, villages and hamlets, carrying dwellings from their foundations and drowning multitudes of the unfortunate inhabitants. Those who could escape in time fled to the hills, but large numbers were overtaken by the flood, and made a desperate but hopeless battle for their lives.

THE MARKET PLACE OF SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO

In Ponce, the most destructive effects of the cyclone were experienced. The Portugues and Canas Rivers, swelled by the sea and the rain, flowed through the center of the town with the force of a tidal wave. Dwellings, sheds, warehouses and docks were soon a complete wreck, and the whole port became a ruin, with almost every vessel dismantled, crushed or stranded. The loss of life was appalling. People who sought safety on the roofs of stone dwellings were paralyzed with terror as they saw the bodies of men, women and little children floating past them amid debris and wreckage. Our American soldiers, who were in more secure quarters, acted with great courage and saved many lives. The Alhambra Plaza, in the centre of the city, was a lake, and the Casino, where the American police were quartered, was so battered and twisted by wind and waves as to be uninhabitable. The bodies of human beings and cattle floated everywhere, many mangled and disfigured by the contact with heavy beams and drift. It was practically impossible to save any of those poor victims who were caught in the current, and amid pitiful cries they swept onward to destruction.

Estimates place the number of dead at not less than two thousand, but it may ultimately prove to be much larger when exact facts are known, which can only be after the debris is fully examined for the bodies of the victims. Hundreds of bodies have been recovered and buried, but it is believed that a still larger number will be found in the ruins. Over 1,000 perished in Ponce, ninety at Cayey, sixty-four in Humacao, twenty-six in Arroyo, 400 in Arecibo, three hundred in Utando, fifteen at Guayamas, two hundred in Tabucao, forty-six in Juan Diaz, 200 in Yabucoa, and as a number of other towns have not yet been heard from, it is feared that they also have suffered very heavily in dead and injured. All telegraphic communications were destroyed. Among the towns which are known to have been devastated, but which have not yet reported, are: Las Piedras, Trujillo Alto, San Isabel, Bayamo, Lallabao, Juncos, Patillas, Coamo, El Cayey, Guayanilla, Naguabo, Salinas, and Carolina.

Playa, the port of Ponce, with 5,000 inhabitants, was completely destroyed. Humacao is a ruin, and its 6,000 people are homeless and starving.

The storm began at seven o'clock on the morning of the 8th, and increased in violence until ten, when a lull ensued, lasting until six o'clock in the evening. It then began to blow with redoubled fury and continued until two o'clock the next morning. A tremendous downpour of rain accompanied the high winds, and every little mountain stream was a raging river. In nearly all the towns, the food supplies and stores were lost, being either ruined by the inundation, or swept away in the general destruction of buildings.

The detailed story of the disaster cannot yet be told, but enough is known to justify the statement that the calamity is the worst that has befallen Porto Rico since the great storm of 1867, when over 6,000 human beings perished. At that time Spain made no effort to aid the stricken people. They were permitted to drown or to starve without a hand being raised to save or a word of compassion being spoken. Now, in their new calamity, these unfortunates will not be neglected. The great heart of the American people, ever open to the call of suffering, is already responding and the first relief cargo is on the way from New York. Other cargoes must follow quickly if lives are to be saved and a worse disaster averted.

When the flood had somewhat subsided the work of rescue immediately began. The stone churches were utilized as hospitals and relief stations, and were quickly filled to overflowing with the destitute and injured. Hundreds of dead bodies were recovered from the waters. The intense heat which followed the storm threatened to bring about a pestilence. The cisterns were filled with sea-water and the ground was soaked with salt. No drinking water was obtainable anywhere.

Gen. Davis, the military commander of Porto Rico, telegraphed to the War Department in Washington, briefly describing the disaster, and appealing for help for the survivors. He estimates the number of destitute natives at 100,000 souls, and expresses the belief that a famine is imminent and asks that 2,000,000 pounds of rice and beans be immediately shipped to Porto Rico on transports to feed the starving. The cyclone entirely destroyed the growing crops, ruined farms and plantations and caused frightful havoc in the interior of the island. The natives cannot produce any crops for months to come.

PORT OF PORTO RICO, WHERE HUNDREDS OF VESSELS WERE DESTROYED

PONCE, WHERE OVER 1,000 PERSONS PERISHED

Immediately on receipt of Gen. Davis' telegram, Secretary Root, of the War Department, issued a proclamation calling upon the Mayors of the leading cities of the Union to open Relief Committees. He has also made a similar call on the Governors of the States. He ordered that supplies be furnished from the commissary department stores in Porto Rico to the destitute. When the news of the calamity was received in New York, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in behalf of its readers, immediately telegraphed Secretary Root, contributing $1,000 for the relief work. In this, as in other similar emergencies where the welfare of multitudes of afflicted fellow creatures is concerned, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD did not hesitate to take a decisive step, trusting confidently to its readers for approval and support.

The next step was the organization of a representative committee for relief work in the field, as an adjunct to the operations under Gen. Davis. Three American ladies of high social standing and already well known for their Christian work in Porto Rico, were invited to act as such committee and graciously consented. They are Mrs. Guy V. Henry, wife of Gen. Henry, Military Governor of Porto Rico; Mrs. Fred D. Grant, wife of Gen. Grant, late District Commander of San Juan, and Mrs. Hanna, wife of Hon. Philip C. Hanna, our Consul-General to the Spanish West Indies. Mrs. Henry was the first President, and Mrs. Hanna the first Secretary of the Women's Aid Society of Porto Rico, which they founded during the invasion. These ladies have authorized the following appeal to be issued to the readers of this journal and to Christian people throughout the United States:

We earnestly appeal to you on behalf of the suffering and destitute women and the helpless and dying children of storm-swept Porto Rico, who through this widespread calamity have lost their homes, their crops, their clothes, in fact their entire worldly possessions.

Your readers have done so much for the starving and dying of India, of Russia, of Armenia, of Cuba, and of our own country, that we know our appeal will not be in vain. This calamity is more awful than any which has stirred your generous impulses, and is at your very door. While remembering that "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me," we must not forget the other admonition, "If any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel."

They are now our own; we have adopted them, and to whom shall they turn in this, the hour of their direst need, if not to us? A similar hurricane swept Porto Rico in 1867, but Spain abandoned her colony to its harowing fate. Shall America do no better? Let us show to the world that America regards her new children as sons and daughters, whose relief in this extremity is at once her duty and her privilege.

The Women's Aid Society of Porto Rico is composed of American and Porto Rican ladies of the best standing, who have been working ever since the invasion to help the distressed of the island; and they will act gladly and promptly in the work of getting relief supplies into the proper hands, and getting them there at once.

Let us all contribute, remembering that he gives twice who gives quickly. A dollar given immediately will do as much good as two dollars remitted three months hence.

MRS. GUY V. HENRY,
IDA H. GRANT,
MRS. PHILIP C. HANNA.

This great calamity, filling the whole island with sorrow and lamentation, and leaving 100,000 destitute, makes Porto Rico more than ever a special charge upon the hearts of the generous American people. They now turn to us for aid and comfort. It must not be recorded that the Christian people of our land ever let such a cry pass unheeded or closed their ears to the supplication of the helpless.

In past years, the readers of this journal have done valiant service for Christ in many lands. By their prayers, their consecrated gifts and their delegated workers, they have lifted the burden of sorrow from tens of thousands of hearts, and have saved multitudes of lives. They have carried forward the standard of the Master and blessed multitudes, receiving in return the priceless reward of Divine approval. Let all help to save Porto Rico. He that giveth quickly giveth twice. Every gift will be acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

LOADING RICE AND BEANS ON THE TRANSPORT "MCPHERSON" FOR STARVING PORTO RICO

Our photographs present some interesting scenes in Porto Rico. On the first page of this issue is shown the government transport McPherson, sailing from Brooklyn with 1,200,000 pounds of rice and beans for the sufferers. One photographic group tells an interesting historical story. It shows the last American and the first Spanish consuls to Porto Rico.

Count Tudela, the first accredited representative of Spain to her former colony, is a diplomat of thirty years' experience, and has represented his government in various West Indian and South American countries. During the Spanish war, he was actively engaged in the service of his government at Hayti and Santo Domingo. Upon the resumption of diplomatic relations, Count Tudela was assigned as consul to San Juan.

Philip C. Hanna, the other member of the group, is the last American consul to the Spanish West Indies, his headquarters being at San Juan. He is the noted young diplomat who has served his government so acceptably at Venezuela, during the troublous times of 1892–3, and who, during the late war with Spain, was very active in protecting American interests in Porto Rico, and afterward at the Danish Island of St. Thomas. Consul Hanna explains that the banana is the principal food all over the island, without which the people would starve. If the report is true that all the blossoms have been blown off the trees by the cyclone, the people will be helpless and dependent on relief for at least five months.

THE FIRST SPANISH AND THE LAST AMERICAN CONSULS IN PORTO RICO

We may never again be under the necessity of helping Porto Rico. Within five years, Consul Hanna says, it will be the richest spot on the earth: the estates will be so productive that labor is bound to share in the profit.

"The field," he adds, "is a noble one for all Christians to work in, for the uplifting of this simple-hearted folk, who like that which appeals to their heart, and who, I am firmly convinced, are capable of becoming representative Christians, as well as representative Americans. I sincerely hope that in the existing emergency, the response to the present appeal of Porto Rico, will be of such a character as to further increase the good impression already made there."

Secretary Root was interviewed in Washington by a representative of this journal. He was exceedingly enthusiastic over the generous responses which his appeal had evoked, and he declared that the American people in this matter were living up to their traditions, as they always promptly respond to appeals of this kind. Their hearts were right, and they were swift to answer the call of suffering, and to pour, with lavish hand, out of their abundance. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with characteristic generosity, the Secretary added, was among the first, if not the very first, to send a response. He was extremely thankful for what it had done.

Let All Help Porto Rico!

PORTO RICO, cyclone-swept and prostrate, appeals to the sympathies of the American people for aid in her time of sore trial and suffering. Thousands are already dead, and over one hundred thousand men, women and children are destitute and starving. The despatches tell the sad story of appalling disaster, and awaken universal sympathy.

On receiving the news of the calamity, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in behalf of its readers, telegraphed to Secretary Root of the War Department, contributing the sum of $1,000 for the relief of the sufferers. If every reader of this journal will send his or her offering promptly, the distress will be greatly alleviated and a rich blessing will follow. All contributions for this most urgent cause will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and immediately applied to the relief work.

These Porto Ricans are our own brothers and sisters. They sought the protection of our flag and became American citizens without a struggle. We have already been instrumental in bringing them many blessings, and in presenting the Gospel and opening Sunday Schools among them. Their utter helplessness now gives them an additional claim upon us. Let us take up the Christian's burden and come quickly to their rescue.

Send a mite for Porto Rico, and with it a prayer for the relief of that sorely-stricken people.

After the Battle

WE all know that though a war may last for years, a battle may be ended in one hour. The war between Christianity and unbelief has been going on for ages, but ever and anon there is a special clash of weapons. In this last quarter of our century there has been a sharp collision between the Gospel and agnosticism. The old war will reach into the twentieth century, and perhaps into the twenty-first, but this particular contest fought by pen in magazine, and by tongue on platform, is about ended. So now let us walk over the battlefield, and count the dead, and carry off the wounded into hospitals, and examine the dismounted guns and the dismantled fortresses. After the battle—look, and contemplate. Surely such a resounding and relentless attack upon the great classic of the Christian must have left the Bible in a bad shape and strewn its torn leaves all across the field. No. Every copy of the old book that I pick up opens with the words, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," and closes with "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen." Then I count the books of the Bible and find that there remain the original sixty-six as in the time of the King James translation. I go into the courtrooms and I find witnesses and jurors sworn, their hand on the Book which has been so severely satirized. I get on board the rail train, and I find a copy by the American Bible Society put in a wooden pocket at the end of the car. I stop at the hotel and I find on the table the Book which says the sun and moon once stood still. I go on shipboard and I find in the cabin among hymn books and liturgies the Book that tells of a sea-monster that arrested a prophet trying to escape his duty. I go into the colleges and universities and I find the president of the learned institution reading to the students assembled in chapel for morning prayers the Book which for the last thirty years has been under concentrate fire. Being fond of great architecture, I go through our towns and cities and I find huge timber and great piles of granite and marble, and the masons and the carpenters are busy, and I say, "What are you building?" and the answer is, "A church." What will they put in the corner-stone? A Bible. From what will they preach from in the pulpit? A Bible. I go through all the respectable houses of Christendom, and it is a startling exception to find a house without a Bible. What are those thousand printing presses doing on both sides the ocean? Printing Bibles—family Bibles, illustrated Bibles, Bibles with commentary, pocket Bibles, Bibles for the young, Bibles for the old. What are the International Sunday School lessons all over the world doing? Explaining to millions and millions of children the Bible.

After the battle can it be that you will find a man of brain or a man of influence who dare appear as a disciple of Christianity? Its antagonists have for the last quarter of a century raised such a roaring laugh against the Christian religion, can it be that a man of any sensitiveness, or who desires to be thought level-headed, will allow suspicion of friendliness to the Gospel to rest upon him for an hour? Could anyone of self-respect stand up against the fusilade of wit and caricature and mimicry? Surely under the clapping hands and stamping feet heard at the infidel lecture the last hope of the grand, motherly religion must have disappeared forever. No! No. At the head of the American nation we find an old-fashioned Methodist bowing his head every Sunday in church, and singing with full voice, "Rock of Ages, cleft for me." Nearly all the judges of the United States Supreme Court members of churches, and some of them so far gone in religion as to be elders in Presbyterian churches. The greatest lawyers of America are Christians. The greatest physicians of America are Christians. After the battle there are more churches, more Bibles, more Christian universities, more evangelization, more consecrated fortunes. The mightiest assault of all the centuries upon the Gospel and the church having left this result, I come to the conclusion that if infidelity will keep on delivering its lectures and printing its tracts and sharpening its wit and spitting its venom and hurling its anathemas, by the middle of next century there will be nothing for the church of God to do but celebrate its victories and garner its harvests and pick flowers out of the desert which "shall blossom as the rose." This is the way we feel after the battle.

The Joy of Living

THE great open secret of happiness is not to be found in any philosophy or by any searching. It resides in the cheerful acceptance of life, in the fulfilment of its duties, and in that serious, true and undefiled religion which "rests in the Lord." To have life, and have it abundantly, this is in itself a great joy. It helps us to meet all emergencies, raises us after every blow; it rises to every occasion; it diffuses its own element, cheers, elates, strengthens by its mere presence. A person full of life has only to show himself, and if his vivacious nature is allied to good temper, it is irresistible. The body ever active, the mind always alert, the spirits always fresh, such an energetic vitality adapts and qualifies a man to the state of things he must live in, and so is the way to success. Life often carries it over brains, because it includes a constant sense of now, with a faculty of making the best of it.

There is a great deal said about the "overwork" of the present age, but the fact is, that very few people overwork themselves. If a man works hard, it generally agrees with him directly or indirectly. Idleness does twice as much mischief as overwork. It is eating too much, drinking too much, smoking too much, doing everything in a hurry, and doing things at the wrong time and under the wrong circumstances that makes mischief.

Reasonably good work is the great happiness of life. There is a very remarkable passage at the conclusion of the Ninetieth Psalm: "Prosper thou the work of our hands upon us; O, prosper thou our handiwork!" Our feelings, our hopes, our dreams, our expectations and our aspirations will pass away; but our work, thank God! remains. Through eternity what we have done, that we shall be. We are told that not a sound ever made has ceased to vibrate through space; and it is much more true that a good thought, or a loving act, has gone forth in vain. The sensualist says, "eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." The sentimentalist says, "all is vanity;" but the Christian prays

> The beauty of the Lord our God be upon us
> O, prosper thou our handiwork!

If we look at our work in relation to what it is to be hereafter, there is no human occupation which is not awful and sacred, because such occupations are the work given us to do—"our portion in the days of our vanity." Indeed, aside from this consideration, they have no intrinsic value; they are just like the lessons of a child at school, worth nothing but as discipline and task. It is right to rejoice in our work, but it is wrong if we forget that eternity from which our work derives its importance. Steam and electricity are great things, but life and death are greater and older. Men lived and died, and loved and hated, and joyed and sorrowed before steam and electricity were known, and they would continue to do so if these things were abolished. Wherever there is life and death we have the great essentials, and the eternal problems which they involve.

Does our age discourage happiness? By no means. It is an age prolific in happiness. Something is always going on; expectation is always on tip-toe. Life is worth living, if it were only to see the marvels which science is daily working; to know the future of electricity; to be spectators of the continuous grand performance of the nations of the world. A man should in these days be ashamed of himself if he cannot derive great happiness from his work, and from the aspects and hopes of the world around him.

In reality there are no more unhappy people now than there has always been; but more people talk of their unhappiness. A great many can at this day put into sonnets their sentimental melancholy, and sell it. If in ancient times a person asked himself such a question as "Is Life Worth Living?" he could not sell his gloomy musings for "copy." A really happy person, however, never asks such a question; he does not even talk about his happiness, any more than a perfectly healthy person talks of his "symptoms." The truth of the matter is that what we call "enjoyment" forms but a very small part of life. It would indeed be a great evil if it was a dominant factor; for "enjoyment" has little to do with our deepest feelings, or our noblest work. If mirth was forced into all our relations of life, it would be as nauseous as sweetmeats mixed with all our bread, and meat, and cheese. No comment on this subject is so pertinent as that of Holy Writ: "I said of laughter, it is mad; and of mirth, what doeth it?"

We are not to flinch from the duties of life: and equally, we are not to neglect its rests [illegible] wisdom to "sit still" and receive the riches [illegible] for the happiness of the future life, if we do well with this life; a promise that surely gives us good hopes that the best and noblest delights [illegible] that the love begun on earth will be as enduring as the soul itself; that spiritual communion [illegible] that the delights of the understanding will not cease their activity.

Those who spend youth well, need not fear age. [illegible] freshness of youth is reserved for those who have come uphill all the way; to find at last the clearer air and serener solitudes of those [illegible] have been gathered this one great fact from all their years of travail and toil—"The Lord God eternal is our dwelling place; from everlasting to everlasting." So then,

[illegible]
Being right glad that they were born,
And thankful that they live!

The American Board of Foreign Missions has suffered a bereavement. Its President, Dr. Charles M. Lamson, died suddenly on August 8. Dr. Lamson was fifty-six years of age. During the past [illegible] gregational Church of Hartford, Conn.

Mrs. [illegible] ing a rescue circle for the reclamation of fallen women. The circle has raised a fund for the purchase of a house suitable for a Florence Mission. Mr. Crittenton has given a thousand dollars toward the amount required.

The whole New Testament has now been printed in Korean. Hitherto the Chinese New Testament has been used. That, however, could be read only by scholars. The publication in Korean has been heartily welcomed. The various books were printed as fast as they could be translated. [illegible]

[illegible] large circle by the death of Rev. John Morrison, Pastor of Calvary Presbyterian Church, Portland, Ore. Mr. Morrison died suddenly while on his way East. He was in excellent health when he started, but died after making a tour of Yellowstone Park. He was in his fortieth year.

There are now six Mormon students in Harvard, and sixteen in Johns Hopkins University. Dr. F. E. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society, says that during his recent journey across the continent he found remarkable signs of Mormon activity in many States, and he believes the church is making rapid progress.

The evangelistic services in the Gospel Tent, "Glad Tidings," in New York, have reached the high-water mark. They have now continued eight weeks. Among the prominent speakers last week were Rev. A. T. Pierson, Rev. Dr. Williams, Church of the Apostles, New York, Rev. Ashley Jones, Richmond, Va., Miss Eva Shontz, of the Y. W. T. U., and Rev. Donald D. McLaurin, of Detroit, Mich.

Rev. H. M. Wharton, D.D., President of Luray College, is offering the usual free scholarships to worthy young women. Orphans or half orphans, of course, will be given preference, but any young girl or woman who is struggling to educate herself, will be considered an applicant for the scholarship. Luray College is situated in the beautiful Valley of Virginia half a mile from the wondertul caverns of Luray. Address Rev. H. M. Wharton, D. D., 304 N. Howard Street, Baltimore, Md.

Rev. John Lewis Clark, for three years assistant pastor to Rev. Dr. Burrell, of the Collegiate Marble Church, New York City, and who for the last five years has been pastor of the First Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Chicago, very acceptably filled the pulpit of Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, in New York City, during the month of July, preaching a series of eloquent and effective Gospel sermons to large and interested audiences. Mr. Clark preaches for two Sundays in the Presbyterian Church at Hempstead N. Y., after which he will probably occupy the pulpit of the Shepherd Memorial Church at Scarborough, N. Y., for one or two Sundays.

The late Judge C. E. Vanderburgh, of Minnesota, who sat on the Supreme and District bench of that State, by successive re-elections, for a period of thirty-five years and was esteemed one of the very first jurists of that section, has left a notable will which has been admitted to probate. It contains the following among other public bequests: $5,000 to Albert Lea College; $5,000 to the Prebyterian Theological Seminary, Omaha, Neb.; $5,000 to the German Theological Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa. A large quantity of real estate in Minneapolis is directed to be sold and the proceeds divided between The American Bible Society and the Presbyterian Boards of Home and Foreign Missions, Freedmen and Ministerial Relief. It is expected that the property will realize sufficient to pay each of these five Boards from $40,000 to $50,000.

Dreyfus Revision

FRENCH society has been deeply stirred by the proceedings of the court martial at Rennes, France, before which Captain Dreyfus has been arraigned The accused man had been kept so completely in ignorance of the events occurring in France during his imprisonment on the Isle du Diable, that when he was put on board a war vessel to bring him back to France, he supposed that he had been vindicated and would be released immediately on his arrival. It must have been a bitter disappointment to him to learn that he was to be again put on trial. On appearing before the officers appointed to be his judges he was, according to French custom, severely cross-examined by the president of the court. The object of the questions was clearly to show that he had knowledge of the facts and statistics which he is charged with having communicated to the German government, or that, if he did not know them, he was an inefficient and unintelligent officer. His replies showed that his knowledge was confined to his own department and that he had made no effort to obtain the information which he is accused of imparting. The proceedings of the court-martial were public except on the days when the secret bundle of papers was examined. These papers, which, it is generally believed, contributed more than the direct evidence toward the conviction of Dreyfus by the court-martial of 1894, had never before been communicated to the accused or his counsel, or the public. It was alleged that the publication of them might involve war. They were probably obtained by some discreditable means from the German Embassy in Paris. They were under examination by the court martial at several secret sittings, but it is evident from the demeanor of Dreyfus and his counsel, that they contained no proof whatever of the guilt of the prisoner. Even Gen. Mercier, one of the most bitter and vindictive of the enemies of Dreyfus, was unable, when put on the stand, to do more than reiterate his conviction of the guilt of the prisoner, and did not produce the conclusive evidence that he has for months past boasted of possessing. Gen. Mercier was severely denounced by M. Casimir-Perier, ex-President of the Republic, whom he had evidently duped during his short term of office. It is now a prevalent opinion that the treachery—if treachery there was—was committed by Lieutenant-Colonel Henry, who committed suicide some time ago, after confessing himself guilty of forgery, and that the miscreant, Esterhazy, was the tool which Henry used to write the incriminating documents and collect the price of them from the German government. There appears to be no doubt that Dreyfus is innocent and that his conviction was brought about by a conspiracy of the General Staff, which includes the most distinguished generals in France. The opposition to a revision of his case was thus apparently due to the fact that it could not be revised without bringing disgrace on officers high in command, who had manufactured evidence against an innocent man. A large part of the French aristocracy preferred that a guiltless man should suffer rather than that ignominy shoul fall on the military leaders. This feeling was so intense as to become a passion and the fiercest hatred toward all who contributed to a revision of the case has been engendered. The malignity increased as the trial proceeded and reached its climax in a murderous attack on M. Labordi, the devoted counsel of the prisoner, who was shot down on Aug. 14 in the public street. The wickedness of such an act, following all the villainy that has gone before, shows that the enemies of Dreyfus are becoming desperate. Their conduct is a proof that civilization does not reform morals. More than three thousand years ago the Psalmist complained that just such men had conspired against him:

The mouth of the wicked and the mouth of the deceitful are opened against me: they have spoken against me with a lying tongue. They compassed me also with words of hatred and fought against me without cause (Ps. 109: 2, 3).

Stalest Bread in the World

A recent visitor to Pompeii writes to a daily journal a description of some loaves of bread which have been found in a bakery of the exhumed city. The baker had evidently just drawn the loaves from his oven, when he had to flee for his life. The city, it will be remembered, was not destroyed by lava from the volcano, but was smothered by alternate showers of fine dust and the peculiar cinders, called lapilli, which buried the city under a coat from fifteen to twenty feet thick. Under this covering the bakery, with its store of newly baked bread, has lain hermetically sealed, for 1,820 years. The loaves are of the cottage variety, weighing when new, about two pounds. One of them was stamped with the baker's name, which is still legible. They are now as black as charcoal; all nutriment is gone out of them and they will be kept as curiosities. Well for us is it that a few years before those loaves were baked, that Bread came into the world which, during the lapse of centuries, has never lost its virtue:

Jesus said unto them: I am the bread of life: he that cometh unto me shall never hunger (John 6: 35).

Fatal Plunder

The tragic ending of a drinking orgie is reported from Montgomery, Ala. A negro baseball club of that city went to Eufaula recently to play a negro team there. After the game there was to be a grand supper at which both teams were to be entertained. One of the managers is employed by a firm of druggists, and he decided to contribute to the hospitality by the gift of some wine. Among his employers' stock he had seen bottles which contained some sort of wine, as he had made out from their labels. He stole one or two of these and carried them off in triumph to the feast. After the viands were consumed, the guests and their hosts proceeded to drink, and among other beverages the stolen wine was produced. Before the close of the evening seven of the men who had drank of it were writhing in agony. Medical assistance was summoned, but in three of the cases it was in vain. The men died in acute suffering and the other four are in a critical state. The supposed wine was "wine of colchicum," and was so labelled, but the man who stole it did not know that it was dangerous. The time will come when we shall find that every sin was like this theft, an injury to the man who committed it.

He that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul (Prov. 8: 36).

A Deserter's Romance

A strange story of the voluntary surrender of a deserter comes from Philadelphia. Major Craigie is in that city recruiting for the United States Cavalry. Early this year a man from Hartford, Conn., offered himself for enlistment and was accepted. On July 11 he deserted, and though a thorough search was made for him, he could not be found. A few days ago a girl about nineteen years old, of singularly beautiful appearance, called on the Major and tried to make terms by which the deserter could escape punishment on giving himself up. She was told that unconditional surrender was the watchword of the department, but that the fact of the deserter voluntarily surrendering himself would be taken into account in his punishment. Two days afterward she appeared again, accompanied by the missing man. He was promptly put in irons and sent to prison. The girl's eyes filled with tears when she saw him fettered and sent away, and she went off weeping without giving any explanation. The man, however, said he was in love with the girl, but she would not agree to marry him while he was a deserter. She made it a condition of acceptance that he give himself up and undergo his punishment, and for love of her he had done so. This is only another proof that the Apostle was right when he declared that love was the strongest of all forces. When it goes out to Christ it transforms all a man's life and being:

CAPTAIN ALFRED DREYFUS

MRS. DREYFUS

Love vaunteth not itself; seeketh not its own, is not provoked, taketh not account of evil... beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things... But now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love (I. Cor. 13: 4-13, R. V.).

Buried in Her Arm-chair

A novel funeral took place at Pawling, N. Y., a few days ago. It was that of an elderly lady, the wife of a wealthy contractor, who had exacted a promise from her husband that when she died she should be buried according to her own plans. She had been an invalid for two years and had spent her time in a comfortable roomy rocking-chair. She had a horror of her body being handled by undertakers' men, and begged that she might be buried in her favorite chair. Her wishes were complied with. A box of chestnut planks, nicely polished, was made, large enough to hold the chair and the body. The old lady was seated in the chair just as she died and it was lifted into the box. It was put on one of her husband's open wagons and taken to the cemetery. There a grave, like a room, had been constructed with the walls of brick and cement. A derrick had been brought and when a sling had been placed around the box, it was lowered into the receptacle prepared for it. The old lady's preference for this mode of burial was doubtless based on a purely physical shrinking from the profanation of the body by the hands of strangers. She must have known that after her death her happiness and comfort would not be affected by the posture of the body. We may hope that as she thought of this she would be able to say with the prophet:

When I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me (Micah 7: 8).

Arizona's Masked Pitfalls

A traveler in Arizona describes in a Chicago journal a peculiar danger existing in the unoccupied regions of that Territory. He found patches of quicksand in some instances of fifteen or twenty feet in diameter, which, to the ordinary eye, presented no signs of their dangerous character. They are called sumideros by the Mexicans and Indians. Fine particles of dust blown by the winds cover their surface, which the moisture below turns into clay. The peculiar properties of the soil retain all the moisture drained into them after the infrequent rains, and allow it to be filtered to unknown depths, so that a man or a horse or a cow or a sheep that once steps upon that deceptive crust instantly sinks out of sight beyond hope of rescue. The sumideros occur most frequently in the alkali-covered flats. Sometimes they are little pockets or wells that a man can leap across, but the longest pole has never found their bottom. They account for the mysterious disappearance of many men and cattle. It would be well if such pitfalls were only to be found in Arizona. Unhappily, there are in all our great cities, places like them, in which men are lost, not only for this world, but for the next:

There is a way that seemeth right unto a man but the end thereof are the ways of death (Prov. 14: 12).

Asleep in a Snake's Coil

A press despatch from Canal Dover, Ohio, reports a thrilling experience which has prostrated the mother of a child. Her husband is employed in the Houk mines, and lives in a solitary shanty near Stillwater. He was on night duty recently, and his wife and her child, about two years old, slept in the bed in the shanty. She woke early, and, looking for her child, was horrified to see it sound asleep in the coil of a big snake. Her start of terror was quickly suppressed lest it should disturb the child or the snake. She lay still in an agony of fear, considering what she should do. At last, she grasped the snake with both hands just below the head. To her intense delight, her pressure of the snake's neck caused it to uncoil itself, and she flung it off the bed. Her piercing screams for help were heard by her husband as he was returning from his work, and he speedily killed the snake, which proved to be a large copperhead. Many a child might be saved from a still more terrible danger if the mother were as prompt to act; but unhappily when a child is in the coil of evil habit, the parents often do not recognize its danger until too late:

The rod and reproof give wisdom; but a child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame. Correct thy son, and he shall give thee rest (Prov 29 15, 17.)

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

Home-Life in the Orient

Dwellers in Tents—In ruined Tombs and Temples—The Harem—Venders and Fakirs

TRAVELERS find that people of the Orient have no home-life, in the Western sense of the word. Home, as we know it, is a distinct product of Christianity. To the Moslem and Hindu, with their strange ideas concerning the inferiority of woman, their practice of secluding wives and daughters and their failure to educate them, the home which an enlightened, exalted and cultivated womanhood, wifehood and motherhood can produce is, of course, impossible.

The freest women of the East are dwellers in tents; the Bedouin sheik's wives at least breathe the free air of heaven. The Bedouin's home is his tent which he moves from place to place. Ask the size of his tribe and he tells you there are so many tents. "Black as the tents of Kedar" is the apt comparison of Holy Writ; for the Bedouin's tents are made of black goat's hair. Rev. Selah Merrill, in his book East of the Jordan, graphically describes a typical night in the desert, when going out of his own tent, he counted a dozen or more camp-fires, some near, others far away, the scene calling up in fancy Indian fires and tepees on our Western prairies. The women of the tents are ignorant and curious; they cluster freely about a foreign guest, asking, "Are you married?" "Have you any children?" meaning boys, for girls do not count. They do not eat with the men, but may be observed peeping at the company through rents in the tent.

Ruined tombs and temples are favorite haunts with oriental peasantry. At Luxor and Karnak this is peculiarly noticeable. On the upper Nile miserable mud hovels, inhabited alike by the "family goats, chickens, pigeons and camels" constitute the average home. In Cairo, Jerusalem, Constantinople and other cities, dwellings of the poor are of a superior order to this. The fakirs, pedlars and beggars thronging the ways to stately mosques and palaces often clear sufficient profit from credulous tourists to make comfortable homes, if money were the only essential. The young Greek in our picture, evidently a prosperous vender of bread and curios, and the Abyssinian nurse-woman and her small charge, doubtless have the semblances of homes somewhere; but the beautiful word, as we understand it, must be a sealed mystery to them, if they are like that large majority of their class yet unreached by Christian influences. As for the harem—home of the wealthy woman—that is a prison, a place in some senses less tolerable and of less opportunity for enlightenment than the stones by the roadside, where the vender, the fakir and beggar are free to watch people come and go and to listen to what they tell of the great outside world.

Dreyfus' Letter to his Child

The lonely life of Dreyfus on Devil's Island, the devotion of his wife, the unselfish care of both parents to preserve their children from even a knowledge of the terrible sorrow which hung over them, is well known to our readers. Mme. Dreyfus always spoke to the children as if their father's absence was one of ordinary character from which he might soon return. In a volume of Dreyfus' letters about to be published, the following, written to his little boy by the heart-sick prisoner, is one of many epistles, pathetic by reason of the suffering concealed.

DEAR LITTLE PIERRE:—Papa sends good big kisses to you and to little Jeanne. He thinks very often of you both. I trust you will show Jeanne how to make big high towers of blocks, which it is such fun to tumble down. It grieves me to hear that grandmother is sad. Also, be kind to your grandfather and grandmother, and do not play tricks on your aunts. When papa returns from his journey you will come to meet him at the station with Jeanne, grandmamma and all the rest. More big kisses for you and for Jeanne. Your Papa.

Friendly Plants

Even a doorweed ministers to man's welfare, so perfectly does our Heavenly Father's wisdom and goodness pervade nature. Old-fashioned herbs clustering about the kitchen steps draw life, not only from sun, clouds and rain, but from impurities cast at their roots from the dish-pan and the wash-tub, thereby preventing development of germs hurtful to man, and converting that which else were evil, into the wholesome aromatic fragrance about our doors. The bean-vine over the kitchen window is useful in a double sense. The spicy pinks and geraniums on the garden path, the briar-rose over the cottage door, help our bodies by beneficence as well as our souls by beauty. "Sunflowers keep off fevers," our grandmothers said with truth. There is a lesson for us in all this. We, like the plants and grasses, may be instruments of a Divine alcemy, converting common things into things of grace. We may perform humble, often repellent tasks, in such a way that we make the spiritual as well as the physical atmosphere clear, sweet and wholesome.

A TYPICAL GROUP IN AN ORIENTAL CITY

The Selfish Child

Nobody loves the selfish child—except perhaps, those whose unthinking devotion have made him such. "Unselfish parents often have the most selfish children; and selfish parents the most unselfish," is a remark we frequently hear. The unselfish mother puts away her share of a choice dish for Bob and Kate. The best clothes are given them and mamma goes shabby. Mamma wears herself out in unstinted service; and all these sacrifices they come to accept as a matter of course. On the other hand, the course of the selfish parent naturally involves sacrifice, self-denial and service on the part of the child; and, in this sense, the selfish parent's child has the advantage; yet the advantage is dearly bought, for childhood's most precious possession, manhood's and womanhood's most inspiring memory, is a loving, unselfish mother. Only let the unselfish mother be on her guard against developing in her child the fault she herself does not cherish, and all will be well. One of the loveliest traits in childhood, is readiness to serve parents, and to find in this privilege and not sacrifice. Unselfishness toward brothers and sisters and playmates is a far more precious and abiding possession than the best hat or biggest piece of cake. Teach your child the valuation of moral qualities.

Testing a Book

The place of a book in literature has nothing to do with the amount of information it contains, says a writer in The Housekeeper. Our school arithmetics and grammars are all information and not at all literature. A book is valuable too for its moral and spiritual outlook, for the beautiful thoughts in it, for the broader view it gives of life, duty and beauty, for its help in bringing one into closer relationship with all that is good and beautiful and true. If a book is full of good, beautiful thoughts, such as we want to copy into our note books, then we want to read it again and again, to get at the meaning of all that is in it. The secret of the unfailing life of the Bible is the fact that its contents are never exhausted. We always find in it something beautiful to think about. Therein lies the greatest test of a good book—its ability to make us think useful and beautiful thoughts.

The Tenement Waifs

From the city's burning pavements,
From the city's scorching air,
Sick, the poor, weak, prayerful children,
Lame, grey-haired, blind, feeble and bare,
From their fever-breeding prisons
Hear each feeble, weary cry—
Will you leave them there to suffer?
Will you leave them there to die?

Let them have one look at nature,
Let them breathe the palmy air,
Let them ramble in the woodlands,
Let them cull the flowers fair;
Let the cool, refreshing breezes
Fan each [illegible] brow;
Oh, [illegible]
There so helpless, poor and weak

They are pleading for deliverance;
Hear them cry, "take me, take me."
Will you leave them there to suffer?
Will you spurn their helpless plea?
Oh, the poor, weak, suffering children,
Will you pass them rudely by?
They are pleading for deliverance,
Will you leave them there to die?

Nellie's Prayer

NELLIE had learned to say "Our Father," and could not go to sleep at night until her prayers were said. Mamma began to fear that her little girl was saying her prayers altogether by rote and through habit, without a due sense of what prayer is as a high privilege and a communion with a Heavenly Father. She studied how she might make the evening and morning talk with God more real to her little daughter; and so she began to say, "If there is anything you want, dear, ask God for it." At first, the child naturally asked for many trivial things—to find a plaything lost, to have her kitten get well, to learn her A B C's without so much bother; for mamma not to be cross with her, and so on. Mamma did not reprove or restrict, only after each request, she would train Nellie to say: "If it is best for me and everybody, dear Lord." "Because," mamma explained. "God knows everything and we do not. We might ask something hurtful to ourselves or some one else." Mamma was also God's agent in answering some of the prayers—that about not being cross, for instance. Many things came to pass without her intervention; other requests seemingly went unanswered. "But," said mamma, "God hears all the same. This is an opportunity to trust him. Trust is better than what we asked for." Presently, mamma saw that in multiplication of requests, Nellie was losing sight of the sweetest and best of all things.

"Dearie," she said, "If you couldn't put your arms around my neck and love me, what would you do? If I gave you a lot of playthings, you wouldn't mind, would you?" The blue eyes filed, the dimpled arms clung closer. "I wouldn't want any playthings, then!" sobbed Nellie. "Dearie," whispered mamma, "let's give God one prayer, just loving him and asking for nothing. How very dreadful it will be if we ask for so many things and get so many things that we haven't any time to love him at all!" "We'll give him heaps of prayers like that," murmured the child, her lips still quivering. By degrees, Nellie came to feel that the loving prayer was the sweetest of all prayers; whatever petitions were voiced, she would follow with a tribute of worshipful trust and love; and presently, mamma was able to make the little one understand how the first three requests in the Lord's Prayer are 'just loving God;" and then how naturally after this, came the petitions for daily bread, for forgiveness of sins, and preservation from evil; concluding with the trustful, worshipful words: "For thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory."

Fearless Birds

When I took a homestead claim on the Dakota prairies, says Alda M. Miller, speaking of the trustfulness of birds before man teaches them fear, the birds were very inquisitive about my affairs. Plover and prairie chicken foraged around the yard and nested in the near vicinity. Larks, wild pigeons, sparrows, buntings and blackbirds boldly flew down to help themselves to the grain I threw to my chickens.

A LITTLE PEACE-MAKER

A Story in Two Parts, Written Expressly for "The Christian Herald" by

. . . MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"APPARENTLY then, we must agree to disagree. If you only would be reasonable, Ethel!"

"It is not a question of my being reasonable, Hugh. The fact is that you dislike my mother so thoroughly that you are never fair to her. You are a different person when she is in the house. As for me, I can't shut my door on my mother, and when she visits me I must treat her with politeness."

"You will not acknowledge that she is interfering and meddlesome and underbred! I shall not do you the injustice to suppose that you do not see these peculiarities of hers as clearly as I do, and if you would for once be candid and own that you see them, and confess that you regard Mrs. Dana's visits as an affliction, I would make an effort to treat her with greater cordiality."

"On the question of breeding, Hugh, I think the less said the better, by a husband who can bring himself to speaking to his wife about her widowed mother as you have just spoken to me. Mamma is not insufferably vain and domineering, purse-proud and arrogant like some persons I could name if I choose; I certainly do not regard her as either meddlesome or intrusive. Naturally, she takes an interest in the affairs of her only daughter, and naturally, if you brand her as ill-bred, you must apply the same epithet in your mind to me. Be careful, Hugh, you may go too far. I was a happy girl once, when I lived at home with my darling mother, and you saw no fault in her then. I haven't found it so delightful being away from her, that I don't look back with envy on those days of peace."

Hugh Mainwaring pushed back his chair, and set his coffee cup down on the table with emphasis. He was about to make an angry retort, when the door of the dining-room opened slowly and a lady of middle age and impressive appearance swept towards the table, with a smooth, low-toned 'Good-morning,' which had a very subduing effect on the disturbed and heated atmosphere.

"Pardon my lateness," said Madam Mainwaring. "It was due to Maggie, who was tardy in bringing my hot water, and then, too, Ethel dear, your breakfast hour is a very uncertain quantity; one day you are early, another late, and I never know on what to count. It is very different at Martha's. Her housekeeping is most orderly, and Hugh, you must remember how fixed was our routine when you were a boy at home."

Hugh did remember it. He had never enjoyed the ironclad rules of his early days. His mother's remark struck him as being decidedly inopportune, following on the conversation she had interrupted. Ethel's mother had just gone after a long visit. His own had just arrived. Neither of the young people got on well with the other's mother, and though Ethel's superior tact prevented her from openly showing her feelings, and kept her from displaying her deepening aversion, Hugh was aware that his wife had no higher opinion of his mother than he had of hers. Both mothers were widows; each had brought up an only child; each was envious of the affection which had won the child away; each distrusted the other, and when, as sometimes happened, the two met in the little married home, which ought to have been an Eden, it became the scene of hostilities hardly less deadly that they were conducted with sarcastic reference and ironical thrust, rather than with tangible weapons. Between them the two mothers had almost succeeded in blighting, as frost blights bloom, the happiness of Hugh and Ethel Mainwaring. The young people were high-spirited and quick-tempered, possessed of an ample vocabulary, and ill-disposed to bear and forbear, as most wedded couples must, in the early years when they are becoming adjusted to one another's ways, and gradually growing with a harmonious wholeness of life.

Most unfortunate are the newly married when obliged to carry on this process under the eyes of any outsider, however sympathetic and judicious. Mesdames Dana and Mainwaring were neither, and the little home with its tottering edifice of domestic peace testified to their misdirected influence in every jarring timber.

"Well!" said Hugh, slipping into his overcoat, "I must be off. Any commands in town, Ethel?"

"Nothing, thank you, except the prepared barley for baby, if you please," was the answer. Ethel was pouring coffee for the elder lady, and did not raise her lips for the kiss Hugh came over to offer her. He stooped and brushed her forehead with the end of his moustache, said good-bye, and was gone.

"Upon my word, Ethel," remarked Madam Mainwaring, "you treat that poor boy with scorn and contempt. At least you might go to the door with him; I always did. A man, in the world with its battles to fight, needs the backing of his home to keep him strong and steadfast. I fear, my love, that since baby came, you are permitting yourself a little to forget what is due to baby's father."

"Good gracious, mother!" exclaimed Ethel, a flush rising upon her cheek and spreading to the roots of her hair, "I would give everything I possess on earth if baby and I could be let alone for one day!"

"Such lack of self-control, Ethel, is very unbecoming in you, and will probably be harmful to your little one. Pray calm yourself and receive a suggestion from one so much your senior as Hugh's mother, without this unseemly display of temper. I am shocked at you, Ethel; shocked and disappointed as well!"

Mrs. Mainwaring had for many years carried on a fashionable school for young ladies; her former pupils were accustomed to the quiet voice of discipline and the restraining cadences of what they called scolding, and she, merited reproof, were familiar in their memories. She had been skilled in the art of subduing the refractory and reducing the rebellious to terms, and it is to be feared that she had enjoyed her power of ladylike invective, and had not scrupled to use it at discretion. From nagging to bullying, the whole gamut was in her practiced hands, and the suffering she inflicted never moved her to pity. In Ethel, however, she had to deal with no shrinking schoolgirl, afraid of tasks and penalties, and sensitive to an expression of disapproval from her mistress. Ethel resented her mother in-law's officious criticism with a fierceness of anger disproportionate to the offence, and due in part to the friction which had preceded it in her intercourse with her husband.

She rose now, a stately little figure, drawing herself up and holding her head high. Her trailing rose-pink gown, trimmed with soft lace; her golden hair, her firm, unsmiling mouth, combined to make her a picture of graceful dignity as she paused a moment to say:

"Only Hugh has a right to find fault with me, mother, but you are my guest, and privileged, I fancy, beyond other people, by a life-long habit of setting the world right. Please excuse me, and I hope you will pass the morning agreeably. I am going to baby now, and later I have an engagement, but we will meet at luncheon."

"Upon my soul!" ejaculated Madam Mainwaring, when she found herself in solitude: "I wish to goodness Hugh had let me pick out a wife for him. Elsie Winston or Mary McDermott would have made him a lovely wife, but Ethel is too much for me, and for him, I fancy."

The elements for conjugal wretchedness being all in order, and the recurrence of scenes like those of the morning being somewhat frequent, it will surprise no one that the young people grew constantly farther apart. Baby, with his wise, wee wrinkled face, seemed to puzzle over the problems in the midst of which he found himself; the poor child did not thrive, and the doctor told Ethel what was the matter.

"You are not yourself in condition to give him the nourishment he needs," he had said weeks before now, when the six-months-old child looking wizened and pallid, ceased gaining weight, and became limp and languid, the physician's advice was imperative.

"Wean the little fellow at once: it is his only hope, and, if you can't make up your mind to a wet nurse, follow my directions absolutely as to the sterilized milk, and the hours for feeding him. I wish I had you with him at St. Beatrice's Hospital; I don't understand it, Mrs. Mainwaring, but life is somehow too exciting for you—you are too nervous, too strained, and this little laddie feels it. American women are far too high strung; if you could take things as the German peasants do, it would be better for your children."

"That's what I am always telling my daughter," observed Madam Mainwaring portentiously. "She lacks repose," said the lady, herself looking like an antique statue, impassive, unemotional and correct.

"Old cat!" said the doctor under his breath, as he slammed the front door. "If Hugh and Ethel could be left to themselves, they'd be all right; and the kid would pick up immediately."

The most quarrelsome pair have intervals of truce, and the most exasperatingly fretful woman has her hours of sweetnes and tranquility. A man, however despotic, must sometimes unbend, and no home is uniformly clouded, even if it have a great many cloudy days. Strangely enough, it was after an unusually prolonged period of calm weather and over the merest trifle, that the next unfortunate quarrel came.

The two mothers had made several visits during the twelve months, and, tractious as they were in some respects, they had a common ground of amity, in baby, now eighteen months old, sturdy on his little legs, and very sweet and dear. His winning ways, his broken efforts at speech, his walking, his teething, his baby loveliness were matters of great pride and interest to each grandmother. They did not agree as to what was best for him, but they both loved him devotedly, and he tyranized over them both. Mrs. Dana was a flighty little lady as to manner, but very gentle and kind hearted. Mrs Mainwaring was always impressive, but she thawed before baby's charms. It was on a visit of her's, that Hugh was so misguided as to quote one of her sayings.

"Ethel, mother tells me that you leave the boy too much to Rosy. She wishes you would look after him yourself."

"I fancy Hugh, dear, that I may be trusted to look to my own baby's welfare. Your mother has too much time on her hands. I suppose she is forced to employ some of it in surveillance of me. I am not sure that she does not peruse my private letters when I am out shopping, or at the club, but I don't mind, I have nothing to hide."

Hugh crimsoned. The insinuation in regard to his mother's curiosity offended him deeply. He thought it coarse and unworthy of Ethel. In point of fact, it had a basis of justice. Madame Mainwaring did not hesitate to open Ethel's desk when she pleased, and she had been quite calmly reading a letter of Ethel's only the day before, when Ethel's entrance unexpectedly, disconcerted her but for a second. A course of spying upon school girls had blunted her sensibilities.

"Pardon me, Ethel," she had explained "I was looking for Lucille's last note, to refresh my memory about her memoranda."

"That is not Lucille's writing, Mater," Ethel had replied calmly. She was really not sorry to have her suspicions and dislike confirmed.

Hugh did not know about this episode. With a man's want of tact he proceeded to re-enforce what he had said at first.

"Your absolute unfairness to my mother, Ethel, is very nearly unpardonable. I desire that you shall speak of her hereafter with respect, at least while she remains under our roof."

"For how long must that last"? said Ethel icily.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

His First Sermon*

I REMEMBER well the first place in which I addressed a congregation of adults. There is a Preachers' Association in Cambridge, connected with St. Andrew's Street Chapel, once the scene of the ministry of Robert Robinson and Robert Hall. A number of worthy brethren preach the Gospel in the various villages surrounding Cambridge, taking each one his turn according to the plan. In my day the presiding genius was the venerable Mr. James Vinter, whom we were wont to address as Bishop Vinter. His genial soul, warm heart and kindly manner were enough to keep a whole fraternity stocked with love; and, accordingly, a goodly company of zealous workers belonged to the Association and labored as true yokefellows. He not only preached himself and helped his brethren, but he was a sort of recruiting sergeant and drew in young men to keep up the number of the host.

I had one Saturday finished morning school and the boys were all going home for the half-holiday, when in came the "Bishop" to ask me to go over to Teversham the next evening, for a young man was to preach there who was not much used to services and very likely would be glad of company. That was a cunningly devised sentence, if I remember it rightly, and I think I do; for, at the time, in the light of that Sunday evening's revelation, I turned it over and vastly admired its ingenuity. A request to go and preach would have met with a decided negative, but merely to act as company to a good brother, who might ask me to give out a hymn or to pray, was not at all a difficult matter.

My Sunday School work was over, tea had been taken, and I set off through Barnwell and away along the Newmarket Road with a gentleman some few years my senior. We talked of good things, and at last I expressed my hope that he would feel the presence of God while preaching. He seemed to start, and assured me that he had never preached in his life and could not attempt such a thing; he was looking to his young friend, Mr. Spurgeon, for that. This was a new view of the situation, and I could only reply that I was no minister, and that, even if I had been, I was quite unprepared. My companion only repeated that he, in a still more emphatic sense, was not a preacher, that he would help me in any other part of the service, but that there would be no sermon unless I delivered one. He told me that if I would repeat one of my Sunday School addresses it would just suit the poor people, and would probably give them more satisfaction than the studied sermon of a learned divine. I felt that I was fairly committed to do my best. I walked quietly along, lifting up my soul to God, and it seemed to me that I could surely tell a few cottagers of the sweetness and love of Jesus, for I felt them in my own soul.

We entered the low-pitched room of the thatched cottage, where a few simple minded farm laborers and their wives were gathered together; we sang and prayed and read the Scriptures, and then came my first sermon. How long or how short it was I cannot now remember. It was not half such a task as I feared it would be, but I was glad to see my way to a fair conclusion and to the giving out of the last hymn. To my delight, I had not broken down, nor stopped short in the middle, nor been destitute of ideas, and the desired haven was in view. I made a finish and took up the hymn book; but, to my astonishment, an aged voice cried out, "Bless your dear heart, how old are you?" My very solemn reply was, "You must wait until the service is over before making any such inquiries. Let us sing." We did sing; the young preacher pronounced the benediction, and then there began a dialogue which enlarged into a warm, friendly talk, in which everybody appeared to take part. "How old are you?" was the leading question. "I am under sixty," was the reply. "Yes, and under sixteen," was the old lady's rejoinder. "Never mind my age; think of the Lord Jesus and his preciousness," was all that I could say, after promising to come again, if the gentlemen at Cambridge thought me fit to do so. Very great and profound was my awe of "the gentlemen at Cambridge" in those days.

In Brazos Bottoms

THE reports of observers who have followed in the wake of the Texas flood, are not reassuring. Owners and tillers of the soil in many parts of the Brazos Valley must suffer for a long time to come. Mischief wrought by the flood is simply tremendous; the desolation must be seen to be understood. Immense trees, one hundred feet high and five feet in diameter, fell before it, and lie cross-piled; in some places houses stand on gable-ends; indiscriminate masses of rusted farm and domestic implements, dead beasts, and driftwood of every kind mark the flood's terrific track. The greatest damage is the immense deposits of white sand from two to ten feet deep, covering thousands and thousands of acres of the richest land on the continent and rendering it for the present year, certainly, completely barren. The rebuilding of houses and fences, filling of holes, clearing away of driftwood, etc., are small problems compared with that of the removal of this sand. A writer, just returned from an exploration in the Brazos Valley, says:

"The truth compells another gloomy view of the situation. Much importance has been attached to the distribution of seed, and the the tenants urged to plant, which many have done to a limited extent. Corn, cotton and peas are up, but these crops are as unpromising as it is possible to imagine. The stalk is delicate and frail, sickly in appearance and color, leaves thin and yellow, and after the sun is well up they wilt, lie flat on the ground and look more like tender vines than vigorous field crops. In a few weeks, after the moisture dries out of the soil, a great majority of the plants will die and none ever reach vigorous maturity."

Our illustration shows a group of negro laborers who have just received food supplies.

The Way of Peace

The benefits of an International Court of Arbitration may be gathered from the fact that already nearly a hundred disputes between nations have been settled by arbitration, and that there is no instance of two nations who have referred their disputes to arbitration failing to obtain satisfaction or finally appealing to arms. If so much could be done with the aid of public opinion while the war sentiment was so strong, we may reasonably conclude that more might be done when a court existed which was created by the Powers of the world, and which enjoyed therefore a unique status and influence.

A Remarkable Incident

An incident that has lately occurred in Chester, Pa., is a striking illustration of the text, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

Miss Tobin, of Chester, was recently notified that a fortune of $35,000 will be sent to her from Germany. She received a letter from John Schmidt, a wealthy resident of Berlin, informing her that he will forward that amount upon receipt of her address. Miss Tobin was formerly employed in the office of a Philadelphia business firm, and it was her custom to travel daily between this city and Philadelphia on the cars. She occupied a seat beside a strange man one morning on her way to Philadelphia and was looking over some stenographic notes when the gentleman addressed a respectful inquiry to her and she answered kindly. She noticed that one hand was tied up in bandages. He explained that he was traveling in America for pleasure and had sustained an accident. Would she accommodate him by writing some letters for him? She would, provided he called at the office of the firm where she was employed. The arrangements were made, the letters were written and the stranger offered her pay for her services. Miss Tobin declined the money, and the stranger, impressed by her kindness, promised that he would never forget her. "I will reward you some day handsomely for this," he said, "and you will never have any cause to regret your kindness to a stranger in a foreign land." He then left for the Pacific coast to finish his travels. Miss Tobin forgot all about John Schmidt and the circumstances until the letter reached her yesterday. "Send me your address," he wrote. "I have decided to reward you for the kindness you showed me in America. I am going to send you a present of $35,000." Those to whom we render kindnesses do not and cannot usually remember it in this way. The doing of a kindness is reward in itself. Besides, God remembers and is abundantly able to reward.

Keep yourselves in love of God.
Let an other man praise thee and not thine own mouth.
Meddle not with them that are given to change.
No man can serve two masters.
Only by pride cometh contention.
Provide things honest in the sight of all men.
Quench not the Spirit.
Righteousness exalteth a nation.
Stand not in an evil thing.
Through idleness of the hands the house droppeth through.
Unto the pure all things are pure.
Verily I say unto you, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.
Wisdom is better than weapons of war.
Xcept the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.
Ye cannot serve God and mammon.
Zealous of good works are my people.

A Thunder Shower's Weight

A writer in the Wilkesbarre Record makes some astonishing calculations regarding the volume and weight of the rain precipitated during an ordinary thunder shower. He says:

Some thunder showers probably let down a hundred million tons of water, or water enough to load 200,000 freight trains. It was stated that, recently, rain fell in Scranton to a depth of 1.63 inches, and it was calculated that as Scranton covered about twenty square miles, that nearly 15,000 tons of water fell, which calculation was very far too small. Twenty square miles, or 12,800 acres. One inch of water to the acre gives somewhat over 100 tons. Thus, if an inch of water fell on those 12,800 acres of Scranton, we find that it makes more than 1,280,000 tons, or, in reality, nearly one and a half million tons.

I write this that I and others may at least partially realize what constitutes a down pour of rain, and grasp something of the majesty of that Being who can so easily hold in his hand a thousand thunder showers, while billions of tons of water gently fall to bless the children of men.

Why wade in rivulets? Figures are an ocean to swim in. Let us calculate that at the time of the Johnstown flood three inches of water fell on every acre in Pennsylvania—46,000 square miles—29,440,000 acres. Three tons to the acre make nearly nine billion tons, or over five tons for every man, woman or child on earth! Is not nature a worker!

Holding Up the Pastor's Hands

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Sept. 3. Ex. 17 : 1-13

HISTORIANS are of many kinds. It seems impossible for a man to write history without writing himself into it. The mere bald chronicle of events is not history. It disappoints the reader. He wants to know the significance of movements, the underlying causes of events. This description of the battle might have concerned itself with the disposition of the troops, the onslaught, the wavering advance or retreat and the final victory; but the writer of Exodus sees something more in the battle than this. He does not depreciate the valor of Joshua and his soldiers. It is a hard fight and we can see that they are acquitting themselves nobly; but the issue of the conflict is not being decided down there. It turns on the actions of three men, who, from the brow of the hill are overlooking the battle. Many of the world's greatest battles have been decided by the action of a man far away from the scene of the conflict. The general overlooking the conflict can see where help is needed, can send a regiment here or there to turn the tide, or to relieve some hardly-pressed brigade. But it is not so that these three men are occupied. Their hopes and their confidence are centred far above the men in the battle. They depend on God to give the victory to Israel, so while Joshua is striving and struggling on the plain these men are praying on the hill.

Joshua will have some mysteries solved for him at the close of the day. He will learn why some well directed charge was repulsed, and why some less vigorous movement succeeded. It was Joshua who "discomfited Amalek and his people with the edge of the sword;" but much depended on Moses on the hill. His weariness had its effect down on the plain. The praying and the fighting must go on together. The sword loses its power when the praying ceases; but the prayer alone does not discomfit Amalek. Joshua's prowess prevails when there is the prayer behind it. He mistakes who thinks that he has only to pray and God will give him the victory. God could do that, but he seldom helps men in that way. He does not dispense with our efforts; he blesses them and crowns them with success.

Thus the fighter gets help outside of himself, and that help may come from another. How many a weary struggler has found that out! After six days of conflict with temptation, when he is almost disposed to let go of principle and drift with the tide, he comes into the house of God and the word spoken invigorates him. He takes a fresh grip of the sword, his drooping energies are newly braced and his hope of energy is renewed. The struggle seems better worth waging; there is nobility in it he had not seen before; he has unseen allies whom he had forgotten. Help comes to him from the hills. It is a new man who enters the store or the office the next morning, a man who has been invigorated and cheered for a renewal of the conflict.

While the conflict on the plain taxes the energies, there is apt to be weariness on the hill, too. That is serious, because the struggle below is affected by it. Perhaps some defeat, some yielding to temptation, some ebullition of temper, some inconsistency of conduct in which the enemy gets the advantage, might often be traced to the pulpit, which, on the previous Lord's Day, did not utter the word which might have strengthened the weak arm. Moses, being human, suffers from fatigue. The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak. Moses, too, needs help. Happily, his companions perceive it and render it. They provide him with a seat and they lend him the support he needs for his arms. He can go on praying then, and Joshua feels the benefit on the plain below. Perhaps the conflict in the office and the store would have a better ending if the minister had more of such help. He needs sympathy; he needs to be told of the victory that is being won through his efforts. His material comfort should be looked after. He will pray and preach all the better if his home is comfortable and his income sufficient for his necessities. He will be encouraged, too, if his friends try to enlarge the sphere of his influence by bringing strangers to listen to him. His arms will be held up if his people second his efforts, helping in the Sunday School and the Young People's Society, in visiting the sick and relieving the suffering of the poor. The pastor should not have the whole burden on his shoulders. His prayer-meeting, the minister's Sunday, should be well attended and he should hear the earnest petitions for the blessing of God on his labors. Above all, his exhortations should be heeded, and he should be cheered by seeing his people walking in the way he points out. So his strength may be renewed and the weariness of the flesh, as well as the exhaustion of the spirit disappear, as his arms are thus held up, while down on the plain the struggle turns to victory.

He Wrestled with Infidels

Incidents in the Life of Elder B. Hill—A Story of Adventure, Struggle and Conquest

THE following history of the life, work and hardships of an humble and faithful laborer in the Master's vineyard will be one of inspiration and help to many who are tried in the school of trouble and affliction; therefore THE CHRISTIAN HERALD takes pleasure in presenting to its readers this simple narrative of a true and earnest life. The writer is Elder Hill's daughter, Mrs. Libbie Palmer, of Alden, Iowa.

Bezaleel Hill was born in Gardner, Worcester County, Mass., April 2, 1797, the seventh of a family of eleven children. His father was a poor shoemaker and a drinking man; his mother a true pioneer woman of sound judgment and sterling worth. His youth was uneventful, save for encounters with wild animals, with which the forests abounded at that time, and the usual experiences of pioneer life. His education was limited, but being extremely fond of books he eagerly read everything his poverty permitted him to buy.

When twenty years old he passed through a season of wonderful religious awakening, when he not only became converted, but deeply impressed with the conviction that he was called to preach the Gospel. Being a poor, obscure mechanic, with no one of influence to aid him, his way seemed hedged about with difficulties. About this time, he visited his sister, living in Vermont, and arrived just as she was preparing to attend an evening meeting. He accompanied her and took such an active part that the pastor invited him to fill his pulpit next day. He did this so acceptably that he was invited to speak at other places during the remainder of his visit.

On returning home, he called upon an old minister—a warm personal friend—whose salutation was the quaint inquiry:

"Well, where have you been? Have you been off preaching?" The abruptness of the question caused Bezaleel Hill such blushing confusion of manner that he was betrayed.

"Well," said the old gentleman, "if you can preach and want to preach, you must have help. I shall make an appointment for you and let our church hear and judge you."

Coming before the members of his own church, whom he felt would be watchful critics, the young man naturally made a failure. But the old minister stood by him, encouraging him to better preparation. He studied under his friend until he had mastered English grammar, arithmetic, etc. After two winters' studying he removed to New York, where he entered upon his ministerial career with his newly wedded wife, who had been Miss Eunice Bryant, to help him. A few years later, under the Baptist Home Missionary Society, he went into the wilderness of Ohio, where he erected a small log-house, into which he took his family. Many were the nocturnal visits of wild animals, and 'once a large bear came and took a calf from a pen beside the door. But with zeal and courage he pressed steadily on, overcoming every difficulty until he had founded more than seventy churches in that State. Making long trips on horseback through miles of unbroken forests with only marked trees to guide him; fording deep streams, and often having narrow escapes from panthers and big, grey wolves, he passed through hardships and perils that would have caused the stoutest heart to quail. His recompense was great, success seeming to crown his every effort. Sometimes he would enter a settlement where drunkenness prevailed, and poverty, wretchedness and rioting abounded. At one such place, Pudding Hollow, he encountered rudeness, insult, and nealy met with personal violence. But being patient and enterprising as well, he took pains to understand the people, and gradually won their confidence, and wrought a great change in the community.

He left a prosperous church and the peace of God where revelry had run riot. During this time he founded the first church in the city of Charleston, a place so hardened in sin that a resolution had been passed to exclude all religious service. The threat had been made to publicly insult and harm any preacher who should attempt to hold meetings there. At a meeting of the Missionary Association, a missionary had been once appointed to go there, but had declined, saying he was afraid. Bezaleel Hill spoke out, saying no minister should be afraid to go where the Lord called; whereupon an old deacon moved that Elder Hill be sent.

Accordingly, Elder Hill went, and upon arrival at the place began inquiring for a Christian. He continued the search all day (during which time he necessarily fasted), and just before night was directed to the house of a lady who had been a member of a Presbyterian church. He introduced himself, stated his mission, and secured a promise of what help she could give. They appointed a meeting in a small schoolhouse by the boat-landing on the lake shore for the first meeting. The news was circulated. Night came on dark and rainy; they went to the place, put candles in the windows and waited, but no one came until a late hour, when the door opened and a lake captain and his crew of twelve men entered. After meeting, Elder Hill explained to the captain his purpose; and found him to be a Christian, but not of the place. Said the captain: "You make your appointments and I will see that you have an audience."

Accordingly, the next night the house was filled with sailors and their families; and the work began. Elder Hill found that he had a community of hardened infidels to contend with; chief of whom was another lake captain. After a few meetings, this man came to the elder at the close of the service and said:

"You will go home with me to-night, sir."

On arriving at the house, he walked in without a word, went to a cupboard, took down a big Bible, and laid it on the table; then placing a chair by it, said:

"You sit down there, sir."

Seating himself on the other side, he said: "You will sit right there, sir, until you prove to me that that book is true, or I prove it false.

And so they talked, Elder Hill reasoning from prophetic evidence until near morning, when after a short intermission for rest and breakfast, they resumed the discussion, and continued it during most of the day, until at last the old captain confessed himself convinced. He and his family were converted, and there followed a great revival.

His experiences during all this time were many and varied. There was a hard struggle with poverty for his wife and family of little ones, and the larder was often empty. Yet they were never left to suffer for the actual necessities of life; and frequently they seemed to be almost direct recipients of God's bounty. Once when the winter had been unusually severe and Elder Hill had been out on an extended trip, the family supplies became exhausted, and the night of his return the last mouthful of food had been eaten for supper. Without any money, in the country in winter, it looked dark indeed with so many mouths to fill. His wife lost courage, a thing she rarely did, and sat down and cried. But his faith was unshaken; he assured her that as he had been in faithful discharge of his duty, the Lord would not forsake them; kneeling in prayer he left it with his heavenly Father, ready to do what God would direct in the morning. But the Lord waited not for the morrow; in the night there came a rap at the door. The elder opened it to find standing outside a man who lived four miles distant, a rich man, but an infidel. Elder Hill invited him in, gave him a chair, raked open the fire on the hearth; and waited to hear his errand. With much embarrassment the visitor said:

"Well, Elder, you think strangely of my coming at this time of night, but I will tell you why. We went to bed last night and to sleep; but my wife aroused me and said she had been awakened by a strange impression that Elder Hill's folks were suffering for food. I laughed at her whim, as I called it, and went to sleep. But she soon waked me again, saying she could not sleep, for the feeling that you people were needing food, as you had been away so long. I got up, loaded my sleigh with provisions and brought them."

In 1847 the Elder's wife died. He distributed his motherless children among the families of friends. After some time he married again and reclaimed his little ones. In 1875 he passed away.

OUR MAIL-BAG

THIS week, THE MAIL-BAG surrenders its columns to letters from many readers on the topic that is now uppermost in a very large number of church communities: Is the church of Christ justified in accepting contributions for its missionary and other spiritual work from the keeper of a saloon? This was the searching question contained in a letter from J. R. N., a reader of this journal, and it is one which has gone straight to the hearts and consciences of a multitude of members of Christian churches throughout the country. In this wholesome discussion, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD desires to give a fair and equal hearing to the arguments advanced on both sides of the question, and it has therefore invited the freest expression of opinion from its readers generally. It should, of course, be noted that J. R. N.'s inquiry related solely to the spiritual or soul-saving work of a church. The letters given below are only a portion of those received during the week, and others will appear in subsequent issues:

D. M. Vineyard, Lexa, Ark., writes:

I would answer No, it is wrong. 1st. Because it would give saloon men a chance to expect at least no opposition from the church, and it would mislead them into thinking they were deserving of God's blessing on their business in return for the support rendered to His cause.

G., (a reader who requests that his name be withheld), writes:

An Episcopal minister personally well known to me, was receiving a salary of $600, and he a man with wife and ten children, his parish being in a small town. For some years the principal saloon-keeper of the town had been paying to the treasurer of the parish fifty dollars a year towards the minister's $600 salary. The minister, having his financial dealings with the treasurer of his church, never concerned himself to inquire who contributed and what the respective amounts. One night returning late from a visit to friends he found, beastly drunk, the brother of two maiden sisters of exceptional loveliness of Christian character. They were weeping in great sorrow. The clergyman asked them who furnished liquor so readily to their brother. The saloon-keeper referred to was named. The next morning the clergyman went to his parish treasurer and asked "if this saloon-keeper contributed anything towards his salary?" "Yes," was the reply; "fifty dollars a year, and always promptly paid it quarterly." "Well," rejoined the clergyman, "I will not receive another cent from him." "But," said the treasurer, "we can't possibly raise the salary without his help, and besides it would wound his feelings to refuse him now, and I hesitate to tell him." "Never mind about 'raising' my salary," said the clergyman; "you just reduce my salary at once by fifty dollars, and that will relieve your anxiety."

It happened that this occurred within a week when the quarterly payments of the contributors were due. When the saloon-keeper went to the treasurer to hand him his money, he was fully and frankly told what the clergyman had required should be said and done. The saloon-keeper was indignant, and expressed himself in most violent language. The next day, seeing the clergyman passing his saloon, he came out to him and said:

"Mr. ——, the treasurer, has told me that you have positively refused to receive any money from me towards your salary. Now, if anyone else in this town had done this thing to me, but yourself, and thus pilloried me to remark before this community, it would have gone hard with him, I assure you, but I have such profound respect for you, sir, that really and truly I honor you for it."

In a very short time this man broke up his saloon, quit the business, though most lucrative, opened a general merchandise store, and though only doing a very small business, yet he never faltered. Then in a few months he was, at his request, prepared for confirmation, and has been since (20 years) a good man, with a happy wife and children, an exemplary Christian, and so continues steadfast in his religious life. This clergyman, a year after, was called to another parish. The first of a large number to request him not to leave the town was the former saloon-keeper, who offered to pay annually the difference between his salary there and that offered him in the new "call." What then have we in this whole illustration but the clearest proof that if we do right, trusting in God, and having the eye single to his glory, whatever we thus do he will protect and bless us and bring mighty things to pass. Better that churches and ministers should refuse all moneys coming by ways of known notorious sinning and trust Almighty God for the consequences.

Mrs. A. E. Freeman, Quincy, Mich., writes:

We say no, it is not right, no more than it is right to sell liquors to our neighbors, where we know they use them for intoxication. We do not wonder that our churches are at such a low ebb. It now takes five different denominations to fill one church. Twenty-five years ago we had to bring seats in the aisle. Let us stand for God and the Bible, and turn our back on the devil, and treat the cause of intemperance as any other sin. The Old Testament is full of woes to the person that sins: Isaiah 1:15 and 9:9, Jeremiah 6, Ezekiel 3, Daniel 12:10, Hosea 4:9 and 4:17, Joel 3:3, Amos 2:6, Habakkuk 2:12–16, Yephamak 1:17, Malachi 3:2–3, Proverbs 21:17 and 23:26–35.

S. G. Shreyer, Oklahoma City, Okla., writes:

One dollar is just as good as another, but when we know that one is obtaining money in an illegitimate way at the time, we should refuse it as a gift, though it be a million. Refuse it as a rebuke, and to prove to the world that the Christian, or church, does not live by money alone.

O. J. Randall, Yardley, Pa., writes:

If the saloon-keeper and all others interested understand that no compromise of Christian principles is involved, the money should be accepted and dedicated to God.

Subscriber, writes:

If, in accepting the money, they do not in any way place themselves under obligation to relax their condemnation of the liquor business or active labors in behalf of the temperance cause and their labors to reclaim the drunkard and to save the young from temptation and the evil influence of the saloon-keeper, they might accept it with the understanding that they do not intend to cease their efforts, and that the giver shall not object if they keep on doing it. Better not take the money unless they are united in their determination to do their whole duty toward breaking down the influence of the saloon and intemperance of every kind.

William Moorhouse, Hastings, Minn., writes:

We [illegible] other liquor dealers for missionary or other Christian work.

Dr. A. G. Hammer, Westboro, Ohio, writes:

When Christian institutions accept ill-gotten wealth for any purpose, knowing how such means have been obtained, they give quiet sanction to the crime. The early Christians were forbidden to eat the flesh of offerings [illegible] Christians abstain from money obtained as the price of crime. Christianity would better die [illegible] of distress. No doubt every dollar the saloon-keeper offers is blood money taken from the mouths of starving women and children.

John Smith, Burke, Idaho, writes:

The gift of the saloon-keeper should be accepted for Christ's work. The following should support its acceptance: Matt. 7:1-5 inclusive. Query: Who of us are competent to sit in judgment on the gift? Read Luke [illegible] could accept from a sinner the gift mentioned, who of us should question whence a gift to him came or the motive?

Lucy Carpenter, Millican, Ga., writes:

I believe it should be accepted, as it might be used to the advancement of some good work for the Lord instead of being used in opposition [illegible] securing their acquiescence in regard to allowcumstances by all means. The motive taints the offer, and compromises Christianity.

E. H. Edick, Cleveland, O., writes:

I believe that to make any acceptable gifts [illegible] give ourselves to God. I can't believe the [illegible] er had intended the gift as an offering to God, he would at the same time have made a bonfire of his liquors and a surrender of himself to the service of God's truth and kingdom.

John G. Osborne, Port Byron, Ill., writes:

1. Christian people, those who profess to love and serve Christ, have voluntarily taken upon themselves the burden, financial and otherwise, of carrying on his work in the world. This is implied in the Commander's parting command, "Go and disciple all nations."

2. The Question rests in the hands of [illegible] and security of all business enterprises. Even [illegible] nefarious calling by virtue of the protection of a Christian civilization. Therefore the world's people owe Christianity a heavy debt, which they ought to be permitted, and even encouraged, in part at least, to discharge. Indeed, some one has said that the world's people, because they do nothing else for religion, should put up all the cash that may be needed.

3. The saloon-keeper's money is just as good as any other money, and, when put into the Lord's treasury, is [illegible] as the widow's mite. The "taint" will attach to it only when in consequence of its acceptance the church waives its right or neglects its duty of rebuking the saloon-keeper's sin. The church should never depend on the world's people to [illegible] part of its [illegible] may accept help from them. The condition is that the church, in accepting such help, should be very careful not to entangle itself in any worldly alliances.

Alfred C. Getchins, Mt. Tabor, N. J., writes:

It is not the money that sins, but the saloon-keeper and his business that is sinful. Therefore I would accept the money, but let him know very plainly the conditions on which the church accepts it, which must be scriptural. The Word says "no" to him that puts the bottle to his mouth, which is the cause of so much suffering, poverty and crime, unfitting men for good citizenship, disqualifying them for voting intelligently and disorganizing and destroying the nation. And if an opportunity was given, the church, as a whole, would vote against granting him or anyone a license. If under such conditions he would still offer his money, which I much doubt, I would accept, thinking there was hope for his repentance.

G. W. Eldon, Kintore, writes:

If the saloon is in direct opposition to the church and to God, I think it is an insult to God to have the servants of Satan stretching a hand each way, as much as to say, "I will work for the best man." When Judas repented and brought back the thirty pieces of silver, they were not used for church purposes. How much money of saloon-keepers has the crimson stain? Let our churches get down on their knees and ask God for his righteousness, and ours will be the increase of the field. Then it will not be necessary to accept from the saloon-keeper the extract of the God-given grain and the extract of human souls.

F. A. Rogers, Selkirk, Mich., writes:

It is not right to accept money from a saloon-keeper for religious purposes if the money has been robbed from his customers; but money obtained by him honestly in some other capacity would be acceptable.

H. A. Granger, Manchester, Ia., writes:

The churches that have the spirit of the Master, are helping families of the victims of saloons continually; hence they should take all saloon-keepers are willing to donate, and use such money donated, but in any good work.

Mrs. Albert Watson, Norwich, N. Y., writes:

It would be all right for a Christian church to accept a saloon-keeper's money; yes, all they can get of it. Although coming from a bad source, the church would use it for the betterment of the world. If rejected, it would no doubt go for more whiskey. As money is something that is in circulation, the church should accept it and use it for a good purpose.

A large number of other letters on this subject will appear next week.

... The Northfield Conference ...

Ministers and Christian Workers of Many Denominations Seeking New Power and Unction at Mr. Moody's Home

ONE of the incidents related at Northfield, Mass., a few days ago, by Rev. F. B. Meyer, illustrates the influence of those wonderful gatherings which year by year take place in that beautiful village. Mr. Meyer says that after crossing the Atlantic, on his way to his home at the close of the Northfield Conference last year, he spent a few days with a friend at an English watering-place. His friend is a London merchant, who takes his vacation at this watering-place. He praised the pure air and the salubrity of the town, but Mr. Meyer complained that when the wind was in a certain direction, he smelled an unpleasant odor. Investigation showed that about a mile away in that direction there was a sewage pond which accounted for the smell. "How is it," the host asked, "that you could smell it and I could not?" Mr. Meyer said, "Because I have just come off the Atlantic and you have come from London." Visitors to Northfield live in a spiritual atmosphere, so pure and bracing that, when they return to their homes, and churches, their consciences are sensitive to the inconsistency of indulgences which do not disturb other Christians and did not affect them before going to Northfield. One after another, ministers rose in the meetings this year to testify of the influence which the Conference had exerted on them in former years. "Be ye clean who bear the vessels of the Lord," had been an injunction so impressed upon them that a new consecration had taken place.

MR. MOODY ON THE WAY TO MT. HERMON

Mr. Moody, as usual, found his functions as host taxed to the utmost. Accommodations had to be found for more than twelve hundred ministers and Christian workers who accepted his invitation to attend the conference. All the buildings at Northfield and the new building at Mount Hermon, and all the tents on the ground were occupied, and after every place seemed to be filled, room was found for the new arrivals. An interesting contingent was that of nearly the whole of the New York Presbytery. Fifty-six of the sixty-five ministers in the Presbytery attended in a body and many of them preached. As usual, the most prominent speakers were Rev. G. Campbell Morgan and Rev. F. B. Meyer of London. Another acquisition from across the Atlantic this year was the Rev. J. G. Cuningham, of Edinburgh. Other preachers were Rev. Sidney Selwyn, of Bournemouth, England; Dr. Wilton Merle Smith, Dr. C. J. Young, Dr. S. B. Rossiter and Dr. James Hoadley, of New York; Drs. Packard and Clymer of Syracuse, N. Y.; Dr. A. T. Pierson, of Brooklyn and Rev. R. A. Torrey, of Chicago. A new feature of this Conference was a series of Christian Endeavor meetings at which Mr. John Willis Baer presided and answered questions on the details of Christian Endeavor work. The musical exercises were under the charge of Mr. Ira D. Sankey and Mr. Geo. C. Stebbins, who were well supported by the trained choir of Mt. Hermon.

An interesting feature of the Conference was the opening of the Moody Chapel, the cost of which was contributed jointly by Mr. Moody's friends on both sides the Atlantic as a tribute to him on his sixtieth birthday. It is built on a beautiful site, which Mr. Moody humorously called "Temptation Rock," because he had pointed its eligibility out to various wealthy visitors to Northfield, in the hope that some one would be tempted to build a chapel on it. That hope has now been fulfilled in a way as unexpected as it must be gratifying to the great Evangelist. The most of the meetings were held in the auditorium, and though there was little interval during the day between meetings, it was generally crowded to its utmost capacity. Mr. Moody declared it seemed impossible to satisfy the people's hunger for meetings. On the occasion when he was to preach he briefly announced the fact, but added that he would advise his hearers not to come to the service, but to go riding into the country to freshen up for the evening meeting, when Mr. Morgan preached — advice which was not taken.

. . BUSINESS LIFE . .

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Rom. 12: 11, . . . Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord INDUSTRY, devoutness and Christian service—all commended in that short text. What! is it possible that they shall be conjoined? Oh, yes. There is no war between religion and business, between ledgers and Bibles, between churches and country houses. On the contrary, religion accelerates business, sharpens mens' wits, sweetens acerbity of disposition, fillips the blood of phlegmatics, and throws more velocity into the wheels of hard work. It gives better balancing to the judgment, more strength to the will, more muscle to industry, and throws into enthusiasm a more consecrated fire. You cannot in all the circle of the world show me a man whose honest business has been despoiled by religion.

The industrial classes are divided into three groups: producers, manufacturers, traders. Producers, such as farmers and miners. Manufacturers, such as those who turn corn into food, and wool and flax into apparel. Traders, such as make profit out of the transfer and exchange of all that which is produced and manufactured. A business man may belong to any one or all of these classes, and not one is independent of any other.

When the Prince Imperial of France fell on the Zulu battle-field because the strap fastening the stirrup to the saddle broke as he clung to it, his comrades all escaping, but he falling under the lances of the savages, a great many people blamed the Empress for allowing her son to go forth into that battle-field, and others blamed the English Government for accepting the sacrifice, and others blamed the Zulus for their barbarism. The one most to blame was the harness maker who fashioned that strap of the stirrup out of shoddy and imperfect material as it was found to have been afterward. If the strap had held, the Prince Imperial would probably have been alive to-day. But the strap broke. No prince independent of a harness-maker! High, low, wise, ignorant, you in one occupation, I in another, all bound together. So that there must be one continuous line of sympathy with each other's work. But whatever your vocation, if you have a multiplicity of engagements, if into your life there come losses and annoyances and perturbations as well as percentages and dividends, if you are pursued from Monday morning until Saturday night, and from January to January by inexorable obligation and duty, then you are a business man, or you are a business woman, and my subject is appropriate to your case.

We are under the impression that the moil and tug of business life are a prison into which a man is thrust, or that it is an unequal strife where unarmed a man goes forth to contend. I shall show you this morning that business life was intended of God for grand and glorious education and discipline, and if I shall be helped to say what I want to say, I shall rub some of the wrinkles of care out of your brow, and unstrap some of the burdens from your back. I am not talking of an abstraction. Though never having been in business life, I know all about business men. In my first parish at Belleville, New Jersey, ten miles from New York, a large portion of my audience was made up of New York merchants. Then I went to Syracuse, a place of immense commercial activity, and then I went to Philadelphia, and lived long among the merchants of that city, than whom there are no better men on earth, and for twenty-five years I stood in my Brooklyn pulpit, Sabbath by Sabbath, preaching to audiences, the majority of whom were business men and business women. It is not an abstraction of which I speak, but a reality with which I am well acquainted.

In the first place, I remark that business life was intended as a school of energy. God gives us a certain amount of raw material out of which we are to hew our character. Our faculties are to be reset, rounded and sharpened up. Our young folks having graduated from school or college need a higher education, that which the rasping and collision of every day life alone can effect. Energy is wrought out only in the fire. After a man has been in business activity ten, twenty, thirty years, his energy is not to be measured by weights or plummets or ladders. There is no height it cannot scale, and there is no depth it cannot fathom, and there is no obstacle it cannot thrash.

Now, my brother, why did God put you in that school of energy? Was it merely that you might be a yardstick to measure cloth, or a steelyard to weigh flour? Was it merely that you you might be better qualified to chaffer and higgle? No. God placed you in that school of energy that you might be developed for Christian work. If the undeveloped talents in the Christian churches of to-day were brought out and thoroughly harnessed, I believe the whole earth would be converted to God in a twelve-month. There are so many deep streams that are turning no mill-wheels and that are harnessed to no factory bands.

Now, God demands the best lamb out of every flock. He demands the richest sheaf of every harvest. He demands the best men of every generation. A cause in which Newton and Locke and Mansfield toiled you and I can afford to toil in. Oh, for fewer idlers in the cause of Christ, and for more Christian workers, men who shall take the same energy that from Monday morning to Saturday night they put forth for the achievement of a livelihood or the gathering of a fortune, and on Sabbath days put it forth to the advantage of Christ's kingdom and the bringing of men to the Lord.

Dr. Duff visited a man who had inherited a great fortune. The man said to him: "I had to be very busy for many years of my life getting my livelihood. After a while this fortune came to me, and there has been no necessity that I toil since. There came a time when I said to myself, 'Shall I now retire from business, or shall I go on and serve the Lord in my worldly occupation?'" He said: "I resolved on the latter, and I have been more industrious in commercial circles than I ever was before, and since that hour I have never kept a farthing for myself. I have thought it to be a great shame if I couldn't toil as hard for the Lord as I had toiled for myself, and all the products of my factories and my commercial establishments, to the last farthing, have gone for the building of Christian institutions and supporting the Church of God." Would that the same energy put forth for the world could be put forth for God. Would that a thousand men in these great cities who have achieved a fortune, could see it their duty now to do all business for Christ and the alleviation of the world's suffering!

Again, I remark, that business life is a school of patience. In your every-day life how many things to annoy and to disquiet? Bargains will rub. Commercial men will sometimes fail to meet their engagements. Cash book and money drawer will sometimes quarrel. Goods ordered for a special emergency will come too late, or be damaged in the transportation. People intending no harm will go shopping without any intention of purchase, overturning great stocks of goods, and insisting that you break the dozen. More bad debts on the ledger. More counterfeit bills in the drawer. More debts to pay for other people. More meannesses on the part of partners in business. Annoyance after annoyance, vexation after vexation, and loss after loss.

All that process will either break you down or brighten you up. It is a school of patience. You have known men under the process to become petulant, and choleric, and angry, and pugnacious, and cross, and sour, and queer, and they lost their customers, and their name became a detestation. Other men have been brightened up under the process. They were toughened by the exposure. They were like rocks, all the more valuable for being blasted. At first they had to choke down their wrath, at first they had to bite their lip, at first they thought of some stinging retort they would like to make; but they conquered their impatience. They have kind words now for sarcastic flings. They have gentle behavior now for unmannerly customers. They are patient now with unfortunate debtors. They have Christian reflections now for sudden reverses. Where did they get that patience? By hearing a minister preach concerning it on Sabbath? Oh, no. They got it just where you will get it—if you ever get it at all—selling hats, discounting notes, turning banisters, ploughing corn, tinning roofs, pleading causes. Oh, that amid the turmoil and anxiety and exasperation of every-day life you might hear the voice of God saying: "In patience possess your soul. Let patience have her perfect work."

I remark again, that business life is a school of useful knowledge. Merchants do not read many books and do not study lexicons. They do not dive into profounds of learning, and yet nearly all through their occupations come to understand questions of finance, and politics, and geography, and jurisprudence, and ethics. Business is a severe schoolmistress. If pupils will not learn she strikes them over the head and the heart with severe losses. You put $5,000 into an enterprise. It is all gone. You say "That is a dead loss." Oh, no. You are paying the schooling. That was only tuition, very large tuition—I told you it was a severe schoomistress—but it was worth it. You learned things under that process you would not have learned in any other way.

Traders in grain come to know something about foreign harvests; traders in fruit come to know something about the prospects of tropical production; manufacturers of American goods come to understand the tariff on imported articles; publishers of books must come to understand the new law of copyright; owners of ships must come to know winds and shoals and navigation, and every bale of cotton, and every raisin cask, and every tea box and every cluster of bananas is so much literature for a business man. Now, my brother, what are you going to do with the intelligence? Do you suppose God put you in this school of information merely that you might be sharper in a trade, that you might be more successful as a worldling? Oh, no: it was that you might take that useful information and use it for Jesus Christ.

Can it be that you have been dealing with foreign lands and never had the missionary spirit, wishing the salvation of foreign people? Can it be that you have become acquainted with all the outrages inflicted in business life and that you have never tried to bring to bear that Gospel which is to extirpate all evil and correct all wrongs and illumine all darkness and lift up all wretchedness and save men for this world and the world to come? Can it be that understanding all the intricacies of business you know nothing about those things which will last after all bills of exchange and consignments and invoices and rent rolls shall have crumpled up and been consumed in the fires of the last great day? Can it be that a man will be wise for time and a fool for eternity?

I remark, also, that business life is a school for integrity. No man knows what he will do until he is tempted. There are thousands of men who have kept their integrity merely because they never have been tested. A man was elected treasurer of the State of Maine some years ago. He was distinguished for his honesty, usefulness and uprightness, but before one year had passed he had taken of the public funds for his own private use, and was [illegible] office in disgrace. Distinguished for virtue before. Distin[illegible] after. You can call over the names of men just like that, in whose honesty you had complete confidence, but placed in certain [illegible] of temptation they went overboard. Never so many temptations to scoundrelism as now. Not a law on the statute book but has some back door through which a miscreant can escape. Ah! how many deceptions in the fabric of goods; so much plundering in commercial life that if a man talk about living a life of complete commercial integrity there are those who ascribe it to greenness and lack of tact. More need of honesty now than ever before, tried honesty, complete honesty, more than in those times when business was a plain affair and woollens were woollens, and silks were silks and men were men.

How many such do you suppose there are in commercial life who could say truthfully, "In all the sales I have ever made I have never overstated the value of goods; in all the sales I have ever made I have never covered up an imperfection in the fabric; of all the thousands of dollars I have ever made I have not taken one dishonest farthing?" There are men, however, who can say it, hundreds who can say it, thousands who can say it. They are more honest than when they sold their first tierce of rice, or their first firkin of butter, because their honesty and integrity have been tested, tried and come out triumphant. But they remember a time when they could have robbed a partner, or have absconded with the funds of a bank, or sprung a snap judgment, or made a false assignment, or borrowed illimitably without any efforts at payment, or got a man into a sharp corner and fleeced him. But they never took one step on that pathway of hell fire. They can say their prayers without hearing the chink of dishonest dollars. They can read their Bible without thinking of the time when with a lie on their soul in the Custom House they kissed the Book. They can think of death and the judgment that comes after it without any flinching—that day when all charlatans and cheats, and jockeys and frauds shall be doubly damned. It does not make their knees knock together, and it does not make their teeth chatter to read "as the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not; so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool."

What a school of integrity business life is! If you have ever been tempted to let your integrity cringe before present advantage, if you have ever wakened up in some embarrassment, and said: "Now, I will step a little aside from the right path and no one will know it, and I will come all right again, it is only once." That only once has ruined tens of thousands of men for this life and blasted their souls for eternity.

A merchant in Liverpool got a five-pound Bank of-England note, and, holding it up toward the light, he saw some interlineations in what seemed red ink. He finally deciphered the letters, and found out that the writing had been made by a slave in Algiers, saying in substance: "Whoever gets this bank-note will please to inform my brother, John Dean, living near Carlisle, that I am a slave of the Bey of Algiers." The merchant sent word, employed government officers, and found who this man was spoken of in this bank bill. After a while the man was rescued, who for eleven years had been a slave of the Bey of Algiers. He was immediately emancipated, but was so worn out by hardship and exposure he soon after died. Oh, if some of the bank bills that come through your hands could tell all the scenes through which they have passed, it would be a tragedy eclipsing any drama of Shakespeare, mightier than King Lear or Macbeth!

As I go on in this subject, I am impressed with the importance of our having more sympathy with business men. Is it not a shame that we in our pulpits do not oftener preach about their struggles, their trials, and their temptations? Men who toil with the hand are not apt to be very sympathetic with those who toil with the brain. The farmers who raise the corn and the oats and the wheat sometimes are tempted to think that grain merchants have an easy time, and get their profits without giving any equivalent. Plato and Aristotle were so opposed to merchandise that they declared commerce to be the curse of the nations, and they advised that cities be built at least ten miles from the sea-coast. But you and I know that there are no more industrious or high-minded men than those who move in the world of traffic. Some of them carry burdens heavier than hods of brick, and are exposed to sharper things than the east wind, and climb mountains higher than the Alps or Himalaya, and if they are faithful Christ will at last say to them: "Well done, good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things. I will make thee ruler over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

We talk about the martyrs of the Piedmont valley, and the martyrs among the Scotch highlands, and the martyrs at Oxford. There are just as certainly martyrs of Wall street and State street, martyrs of Fulton street and Broadway, martyrs of Atlantic street and Chestnut street, going through hotter fires, or having their necks under sharper axes. Then it behooves us to banish all fretfulness from our lives, if this subject be true. We look back to the time when we were at school, and we remember the rod, and we remember the hard tasks, and we complained grievously; but now we see it was for the best. Business life is a school, and the tasks are hard, and the chastisements sometimes are very grievous; but do not complain. The hotter the fire the better the refining. There are men before the throne of God this day in triumph who on earth were cheated out of everything but their coffin. They were sued, they were imprisoned for debt, they were throttled by constables with a whole pack of writs, they were sold out by the sheriffs, they had to compromise with their creditors, they had to make assignments. Their dying hours were annoyed by the sharp ringing of the door-bell by some impetuous creditor who thought it was outrageous and impudent that a man should dare to die before he paid the last half dollar.

I had a friend who had many misfortunes. Everything went against him. He had good business capacity and was of the best of morals, but he was one of those men such as you have sometimes seen, for whom everything seems to go wrong. His life became to him a plague. When I heard he was dead, I said: "Good—got rid of the sheriffs!" Who are those lustrous souls before the throne? When the question is asked, "Who are they?" the angels standing on the sea of glass respond: "These are they who came out of great business trouble and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

A man arose in Fulton street prayer-meeting and said: "I wish publicly to acknowledge the goodness of God. I was in business trouble. I had money to pay, and I had no means to pay it, and I was in utter despair of all human help, and I laid this matter before the Lord, and this morning I went down among some old business friends I had not seen in many years just to make a call, and one said to me, 'Why, I am so glad to see you! Walk in. We have some money on our books due you a good while, but we didn't know where you were, and therefore not having your address we could not send it. We are very glad you have come?" And the man standing in Fulton street prayer-meeting said: "The amount they paid me was six times what I owed." You say it only happened so? You are unbelieving. God answered that man's prayer.

Oh, you want business grace. Commercial ethics, business honor, laws of trade are all very good in their place, but there are times when you want something more than this world will give you. You want God. For the lack of Him some that you have known have consented to forge, and to maltreat their friends, and to curse their enemies, and their names have been bulletined among scoundrels, and they have been ground to powder; while other men you have known have gone through the very same stress of circumstances triumphant. There are men here to-day who fought the battle and gained the victory. People come out of that man's store, and they say: "Well, if there ever was a Christian trader, that is one." Integrity kept the books and waited on the customers. Light from the eternal world flashed through the show windows. Love to God and love to man presided in that storehouse. Some day people going through the street notice that the shutters of the window are not down. The bar of that store door has not been removed. People say, "What is the matter?" You go up a little closer, and you see written on the card of that window: "Closed on account of the death of one of the firm." That day all through the circles of business there is talk about how a good man has gone. Boards of trade pass resolutions of sympathy, and churches of Christ pray, "Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth." He has made his last bargain, he has suffered his last loss, he has ached with the last fatigue. His children will get the result of his industry, or, if through misfortune there be no dollars left, they will have an estate of prayer and Christian example which will be everlasting. Heavenly rewards for earthly discipline. There "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest."

How a Tornado Looks

The Great Storm at New Richmond, Minn., Described by an Eye-Witness

A READER of this journal sends us this remarkably vivid description of the terrible tornado at New Richmond, which, in view of the prevalence of great storms in several sections of the country, will be read with special interest. The account is that of another person—an eye-witness—who shared the dangers whereof he writes:

"At about 5:52 o'clock the funnel formed and the bright clouds on either side were swallowed up in the funnel. I saw the funnel-shaped black clouds when they were ten miles south of New Richmond. It seemed to me that the funnel-shaped big cloud was struggling with the terrible northwest wind that made direct way for the funnel. The struggle lasted but a minute or so. The vortex of the funnel sucked in all the clouds that came near it. At 5:55 there was a great noise, similar to a heavy freight train on an up grade. At 6 P. M. the noise increased, and three minutes after six it sounded like 100 or 1,000 freight trains making direct for the town. The storm moved at a velocity of about forty-eight miles an hour. At five minutes after 6 o'clock the noise was like a million lions or demons devouring their prey. The storm destroyed the town in about one minute

"While the tornado was passing over the town there was a strong and perceptible odor, most disagreeable. All the outer part of the funnel was black, but the interior was constantly lighted up by lightning. The motion of the air was spirally inward and upward.

"All objects—trees, houses, etc.—were drawn inward toward the centre of the funnel; and heavy bodies were drawn upward in the centre of the funnel. Some objects were carried a couple of miles before they were thrown out of the vortex. The funnel sucked up all the water in a couple of small lakes, and fishes were scattered in all directions. In some of the houses which were not entirely destroyed, the closed doors and windows were thrown outward with great force, as if from an explosion.

"For about ten minutes before the storm reached the town the horses became uneasy and unmanageable. They caught the scent of the storm and manifested a desire to leave the town. A few dogs took up the scent of the imminent danger and followed a course directly westward for over two miles. The dogs did not return to town for more than two days afterward. Men and women who escaped uninjured were dazed and assumed a death-like appearance. Many women acted as if insane—screamed, pulled their hair and moved heedlessly about like lunatics. The men were stunned for a short time and, to all appearances, they could not realize what had happened."

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

Mrs. Sia and Little Bo-gi

How a Chinese Widow and an Orphan Denied Themselves Many Things for Christ's Sake.

IN recent issues we have published occasional letters from Miss Mary E. Talmage, an American missionary at Amoy, China (and neice of Rev. Dr. Talmage), giving interesting details in connection with her mission work there. To-day we print another letter just received, which may well act as a generous inspiration to American Christians. She writes as follows:

AMOY, China.

Mrs. Sia, the Chinese teacher of our Girls' Boarding School, is a widow who has had to support two orphan grandchildren. The boy has been of great expense to his grandmother, as he has always been delicate, and is hardly able yet to earn his own living. The girl, named Bo-gi (which means Longing-after-Righteousnes) has been through boarding school, and is an assistant teacher with a salary of three dollars a month and her board.

Mrs. Sia some years ago was asked to do the work of a Bible woman, but declined, as her health and family affairs were such that she felt unable. She could not, however, dismiss the matter from her mind, and so, without speaking to others, she began to save up money, and when it amounted to twenty dollars, brought it in a very quiet way, asking that a substitute might be sent in her place, and that no mention be made of her gift. Some time after this, she brought another donation of twenty dollars to continue the support of the Bible woman.

BO GI AND MRS. SIA

Mrs. Sia since then has been for years a most earnest, faithful Christian teacher in the boarding school, receiving the small salary of five dollars a month and her food. In addition to this she receives each month a very little rent from a small house left to her by her husband. For some weeks past she has not been well, and was advised by her physician to chiak-po (eat nourishing food). I asked her one day if she did chiak-po. She answered yes, that she was taking milk.

I asked, "Why not eat eggs, too?" Her reply was that it was too extravagant.

We are now in the midst of our hottest weather, and she told me that she was going to try to go to the beach (a walk of five minutes) late each afternoon to see if it would not make her stronger. She said she attempted it one day, but when only half way there she felt she had no strength to go further, and so returned home. Another day she attempted it and fell down. I asked why she did not hire a sedan chair (a cost of eight cents) to carry her one way, until she felt strong enough to walk both. Her reply again was that it was too extravagant.

Yesterday she asked me, when I was passing, to call in, as she had something to say to me. After speaking about some school matters she continued much as follows: "Bo-gi and I have received much benefit from this school," (she might as truthfully have said that they both have been of almost invaluable service in the school) "and I have been thinking, for a long time that I would like to give something toward the expenses of the school, or toward the new school building fund. Bo-gi would like to give something also, but it is only a little that we can give." She then opened the table drawer by which she was sitting and took out a roll of twenty silver dollars, and said: "This is Bo-gi's donation;" then she handed me two other rolls, each containing fifty shining dollars, as her own gift, and said: "I wish you to use this for school expenses as you think best." In addition she handed me four dollars for our children's home. She donates to that institution every year, beside giving to the regular church collections. As I saw the rolls of dollars before me I was too overcome to say much. It amounted to more than six month's salary for Bo-gi, and twenty months salary for Mrs. Sia. I said: "Think again before you give such an amount. You have been to a great deal of expense for medicines and chiak-po and neither of your grandchildren is strong and they require extra care." But she answered: "We cannot do much, but are glad to do this," and her face fairly beamed when she gave me the money.

I was deeply impressed by her desire to show her love for her Master. It reminded me of Mary with her alabaster box of ointment. And can we not again hear the pleased voice of the Master, "She hath wrought a good work on me. She hath done what she could."

Is it true what some foreign mission sceptics say, that Chinese Christians are "rice Christians?" May we not rather learn from some of them grand lessons of self-sacrifice and giving? Let us, of Christian lands, examine our own selves and see if we are really giving anything worthy the name of sacrifice to him whom we profess to love above all else.

A Montana Camp Asks Prayers

Many touching letters are received from different parts of the country by the conductors of the revival services at the Gospel tent, "Glad Tidings," in New York. These communications prove the widespread and far-reaching interest which a movement of this character possesses. Among the letters received by Rev. S. Hartwell Pratt, (the leader of the evangelistic services) during the week was the following:

THOMPSON FALLS, MON., AUG. 1st, 1899.

To the good people of the Gospel Tent "Glad Tidings," New York

What shall I say? My heart almost fails me. But I feel something must be done, and that done through prayer, as no missionaries come to us. I am a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and I am going to ask an extraordinary thing of your people. Pray for a people that are destitute of religion and who need Jesus preached to them. We are a saw-mill camp of about sixty or seventy people. The money earned is spent in gambling and drinking. Yet this is not a bad people. They have not the opportunity of embracing anything good and the bad is ever present. Why is it that the devil never minds going out of the way or off the road to do his work? There are a good many places about here where men do not hear the Gospel from one year's end to another. Oh, if these people do not need religion no one ever did. My husband and I live among them and we try to live right and to serve our Lord, but my heart almost fails me to hear so much profane language.

Oh, pray as you never prayed before. You owe it to your fellow man, if it is way off in the wilds of Montana. There are souls to be saved here. While you are blessed under the sound of the Gospel pray for us, who never hear it. I read of so many souls being saved in your Gospel tent and rejoice and feel that your united prayers for us would do untold good. Your sister in the good work.

Encouraging the Builders

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 10. Hag. 2: 1-9
Golden Text, Hag. 2: 4

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE people of the land had "weakened the hands of the people of Judah," who had returned from Babylon and had undertaken the rebuilding of the temple, "and troubled them in building" (Ezra 4: 4). And the people yielded to discouragement when the building was made to cease "by force and power" (Ezra 4: 23), and they who were once so full of zeal for the house of God became absorbed by personal interests. How often have children of God in the present day yielded to discouragement when difficulties have arisen, because they did not, like Moses, endure "as seeing him who is invisible" (Heb. 11: 27). Why is it that some are always successful in the work of the Lord, however discouraging their circumstances may be? How is it that some who have no special talent, no money to fall back upon, no influence with people in power, nevertheless always succeed in what he trusts them to do for him? There is but one answer. Knowing their own utter insufficiency, they count on God for everything and at all times, and he does not fail them. They look, "not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen, for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal" (II. Cor. 4: 18).

The very "sons of oil," Joshua and Zerubbabel, were powerless to go forward while the burden of a discouraged and unbelieving people weighed upon them, but God stirred up two of his prophets, Haggai and Zechariah, the son of Iddo, and the two men whose hearts were right, these "sons of oil," at once responded to the call of God by his prophets, and notwithstanding the royal decree, by which the building had been arrested, they commenced, in obedience to the divine decree, to rise up, and build the house of God at Jerusalem, the prophets helping them. These four men dared to obey God rather than men, and he undertook to manage things at court. When the governors, Tatnai and others, came to interfere, God gave his people to write a letter, which was sent to Darius, the king, and meanwhile their enemies "could not cause them to cease" building, for "the eye of their God was upon them" (Ezra 5: 5).

But the people, as well as the priest and the governor, must be aroused: they had seen their leaders put their hands to the work of the Lord but they also must accept and feel their responsibility, and back up by the ready response of their leaders in building with their own hands. The words of Haggai came with great power to these people. God sent him to convict them of their sin in saying among themselves, "The time is not come, the time that the Lord's house should be built." God had stirred up Cyrus to set them free, that they might build his house and now instead of surmounting all difficulties by faith in God, and building, trusting him to overcome the opposition, they had taken for granted that God's time had not come, judging only from circumstances which were against them, instead of hearkening to his express Word. Thus the heathen around would have the impression that the God of Israel was no stronger than their gods, and that he could not overcome the foes which were against them, and they sank down to the level of the heathen in putting self first, building their own houses, while God's house "lay waste" (Hag. 1: 2-6).

Haggai sets before them their selfishness, its consequences, and calls upon them in the name of the Lord to consider their ways. A blight had been upon their farming and all their other industries (Hag. 1: 6, 9, 10, 11), "because of mine house that lieth waste, and ye run every man unto his own house," was God's message to them. They were convicted; the spirit of the remnant of the people was stirred as the spirit of Jeshua and Zerubbabel had been stirred, "and they came and did work in the name of the Lord of hosts their God" (ver. 14). And now that they had taken to heart the word of reproof, God sends them a word of encouragement. This is always God's order: That which is wrong must be set right, sin confessed and put away, before the Lord can encourage, as he loves to do. God must be true that he may be merciful. He cannot heal unrenounced sin; but no sooner do his children repent than he hastens to help.

This was his message to the leaders and to the people: "Who is left among you that saw this house in her first glory, and how do ye see it now? Is it not in your eyes, in comparison of it as nothing? Yet now be strong, O Zerubbabel, saith the Lord; and be strong, O Jeshua, son of Josedech, the high priest; and be strong all ye people of the land, saith the Lord, and work: for I am with you, saith the Lord of hosts." In Chapter 1, the whole tone is: I am against you, against your cieled houses, your planting, your clothing; there is no blessing upon it. When ye brought home your harvest, "I did blow upon it." "The heavens over you is stayed from dew, and the earth is stayed from her fruit." It was no accident. "It was my doing. I called for a drought upon the land, and upon the mountains, and upon the corn, and upon the new wine, and upon the oil, and upon that which the ground bringeth forth, and upon men and upon cattle, and upon all the labor of the hands." And now, what a change! "I am with you, saith the Lord."

God is not changed, and he is the same God now as he was to Israel of old. Another building is going on—the building of the body of Christ, by "that which every joint supplieth," or (R. V.) "every joint of the supply"; "dealing truly," "speaking truth in love" (Eph. 4: 12-16). In this building, personal interest—everyone the Lord's, is the great requirement to progress. And truly, when children of God make personal interest—even if it be the interest of their own spiritual state or that of their individual worth for the Lord—to take precedence of his great purpose, the building up of his body, a blight comes over them.

"THE DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS SHALL COME"

Lesson Points

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

WHEN the Jews had laid the foundation of their temple, as described in last week's lesson, the work of building was suddenly interrupted, owing to the hostility of the alien people around them. It will be remembered that these people offered to help in the rebuilding of the temple, and that their help was firmly declined. They were people of foreign races, the descendants of settlers whom the king of Assyria had sent there, more than a hundred years before, to occupy the northern kingdom, after Israel had been carried away prisoners. The Jews, on their return from Babylon, having learned by bitter experience the sad results of associating with the heathen, could not accept their help in building a temple to Jehovah. The people, piqued at this rejection of their offer, resolved that the temple should not be built. They hindered it by every means in their power, and even went to the expense of hiring counsellors in the Persian court to prejudice the king against the Jews and their enterprise. Through their efforts the work was suspended for about fifteen years. The story of this period of inaction as told by Ezra, combined with incidental remarks in Haggai and Zechariah, give an impression that Zerubbabel, who who was the civil governor, and Jeshua, who was high priest, were both weak men, who were easily discouraged. They speedily arrived at the conclusion that the time for building the temple had not come, that, in fact, this time was not propitious. Accordingly the Jews turned their attention to their own houses and proceeded to make themselves comfortable. There was abundant building material among the ruins and they soon had magnificent houses erected and [illegible] and vineyards and [illegible]. All [illegible] the temple [illegible] was [illegible] in the foundation stone [illegible] and [illegible] of the [illegible] people. [illegible] to a sense of their [illegible] by the [illegible] of the prophet Haggai. He [illegible] old man, probably over eighty years of age, who, as a boy, had seen the first temple. With thrilling words he upbraided the people for their supineness, and urged them to resume work on the temple. His appeals took instant effect. Within three weeks, carpenters and masons were set to work. But even then there were many—Zerubbabel probably among the number—who had little hope or zest. It was necessary for Haggai to keep them up to their duty and encourage them. Haggai was helped in this effort by Zechariah, a young priest educated in Babylon, who came to the aid of the venerable prophet. These two men pleaded and protested by turns, putting life and spirit into the work. Among other means of stimulus, they assured the people that their poor temple, which would have no ark nor any of the splendor of the old temple, would have a greater and better glory, for into it should come the long-looked-for Messiah, who would be "the desire of all nations."

Be strong and work for I am with you. Such a message must be puzzling to some people in our day, who are fond of singing: "Doing is a deadly thing; doing ends in death." The fact of God being with the people might have been taken as a reason for doing nothing, because he would do it all. But that is not God's way. If a man wants to get to the top of a mountain and prays that God will place him there, he will find that his prayer is not answered. But if he prays that God will give him strength to climb the mountain, he will find that God will answer that prayer. To every man who is trying to be a better man, to live a life above that which consists in mere pleasure and indulgence; to every man who is trying to get free from evil habits, this message comes with a voice of power; "Be strong and work, for I am with you." That assurance gives a man courage and energy. In the cities it is very common to see a notice on the vacant floor of some building, that it may be rented with or without power. That means that there is an engine in the building, and that if the incoming tenant has printing presses or any kind of machinery, he can have power to turn them. He need not set up his own engine; there is plenty of power in the building, which can be supplied to him for any purpose. He has merely to put a leather band on his machine, attaching it to the engine wheel, and his machinery will turn. That is the way it is in the kingdom of God. Men must do the work, but the power to do it is supplied by the Almighty.

The desire of all nations shall come. It is little likely that Haggai understood the full meaning of this message that God sent by him to his people. In these days we realize how appropriate was the title thus given to Christ. In every nation to which the Gospel of Christ has been carried, this title has been proved true. He satisfies the longings of the people. When he is preached, the best of the people declare that he is what they want, and when they come to know him by spiritual communion with him, they find that he is all and more than all that they need. A missionary among the Esquimaux found that they had in their language no word for Saviour. He was in a difficulty, for, of course, he needed such a word more than any other. So he said to them: "Does it not happen sometimes when you are out fishing that a storm arises and some of you are lost and some are safe?" They said that such an experience was common. Then the missionary asked: "Does it not happen that sometimes when you are in the water one of you is saved by some friend who stretches out his hand to help you?" They replied: "Very often." The missionary said: "Then what do you call that friend?" They gave him the word which they used to describe such a friend, and in preaching and translating the Bible he used that word as an equivalent for Saviour, and the idea was clear to them. In all lands there are many people in need of such a friend, and as Jesus fulfils that function he is rightly called "The desire of all nations."

A Converted Infidel's Sacrifice

After Experiencing a Change of Heart, Marshall O. Waggoner Decided to Burn his Infidel Library—A Remarkable Illustration of Saving Grace

FEW individual instances of conversion in recent years have attracted more widespread attention than the case of Marshall O. Waggoner, of Toledo, Ohio. Mr. Waggoner has been an infidel all his life, and now in his old age he has been brought almost miraculously into the light of Gospel truth, and has accepted Christ as a loving Saviour. Like Saul of Tarsus, Mr. Waggoner was an active persecutor of Christianity, inasmuch as he wrote against it, spoke against it on the public platform, and gathered together an infidel library—with which he disseminated as widely as possible the doctrines of Paine, Voltaire and the later school of atheists and agnostics.

Something less than a year ago the great change came. In a single night, without any human aid or intervention, the light broke in upon the infidel's soul, and the Bible which he had so long derided and condemned became to him the revelation of Divine truth, and the Gospel of Jesus the most precious of gifts. His heart opened in fervent prayer. He was transformed. The slanderer of sacred things became the ardent apostle, and the mocker of Jesus was glad to rank as his humble and unworthy follower.

The story of Mr. Waggoner's conversion and of his resolve to commit his infidel books to the flames is told below in his own words. Mr. Waggoner, in conversation, told the story of his lifelong infidelity without any hesitation. He said:

"For sixty years I have been an unbeliever. I have become a firm believer in Christ. As a first step I decided to burn the infidel library which I spent many years in collecting. These were the works in which I formerly found pleasure, and from which I drew the arguments to support me in my unbelief.

"I was born in Norwalk, O., in 1826, and almost from my earliest youth I have denied the truth of the Scriptures. This was all the more strange in view of the fact that my early surroundings were religious. But I doubted the Bible even at ten years of age, and as I grew older I sought everywhere for proofs or arguments which would satisfy me that the miracles told of in the Old and New Testaments were false.

"Of course such arguments I soon found. That they were weak and false I now see clearly, but they satisfied me then. I kept my unbelief a secret, as I did not want to hurt the feelings of my parents. The works of Paine, Voltaire and Pythagorus, Huxley, A. Bennett, Adams and many others I read very eagerly, and I scorned all who did not believe as I did. I was not an agnostic, but a materialistic and uncompromising infidel, glorying in my unbelief and despising all who believed in God as being under the sway of a superstitious faith. Besides, I was an active propagator of infidelity, and frequently wrote for the infidel press.

"Nearly a year ago, on Nov. 19, 1898, the light broke in on my soul, and the clouds of unbelief broke and scattered. My eyes were opened and I saw that what I had formerly regarded as light was the blackest darkness. My conversion was partly due to the teachings of my grandmother when I was a child. She had labored to impress me with a belief in immortality. Some of her teachings have always been indelibly engraved upon my heart, and it was these that finally led me to the change. That night I spent hours with the Bible on my knee. I prayed earnestly and felt that my prayer was not in vain. Peace stole into my heart—the peace of heaven. Since then I have labored to bring others to the belief I now hold. I have held services in more than ninety churches and my work has only begun. Each day finds me more fully persuaded of the truth at which I used to scoff."

Regarding the statement that he had decided to burn his infidel books, Mr. Waggoner said:

"I decided to burn the library in which I formerly found my pleasure and the arguments for my unbelief. There are probably 100 books in all. At first I intended to destroy them in a public bonfire at which I would tell my experience and the reason why I wish to bring others to the faith which I know to be true. But I have now decided that the burning shall be in private and witnessed only by the members of the Memorial United Brethren Church, with which I have allied myself.

"In all these months since I was converted I have enjoyed a peace which I never had in the days of unbelief. My wonderful experience shows that there is nothing impossible for Divine grace to accomplish in the sinful human heart."

Mr. Waggoner has written to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this brief letter, which, as supplementing his experience given above, will be read with interest:

To the Editor "Christian Herald."

DEAR BROTHERS IN CHRIST: I have seen our dear pastor, Rev. Frederick P. Roselot, of the Memorial U. B. Church, and, after a little careful reflection, we came to the conclusion not to have the "cremation" of my books in a public manner, but quasi-privately—only the few members and officers of the church present, and the time not known generally, so as to avoid a crowd.

M. O. WAGGONER.

MARSHALL O. WAGGONER
The Converted Infidel who Committed his Books to the Fire

Mr. Waggoner's decision to burn his books has influenced another family to destroy an infidel library, which has been in its possession for several years. When Henry M. Tabor, a noted agnostic, died in New York some time ago, he left some 500 copies of an infidel book which he had spent the greater part of his later life in writing. His heirs (who did not share his views), on learning of Mr. Waggoner's experience, decided to profit by his example and have accordingly burned the Tabor volumes, his daughter, who was also the executor, giving the order. Although her father lived and died an agnostic she is resolved to do all that lies in her power to stop the spread of unbelief.

The Peace of the World

Some of the Good Results Flowing from the Hague Peace Conference

HON. ANDREW D. WHITE, United States Ambassador to Germany, and the leader of the American deputation to the recent Peace Conference, has prepared a brief summary of the results of the conference. He says:

"In my opinion great good was accomplished—far more, in fact, than any of us dared expect or even hope when we came together.

"As to disarmament, everybody really thinking upon the subject must see that a good system of arbitration must come first, and that then, when arbitration has diminished the liklihood of war, the argument for cutting down forces and armaments is greatly strengthened. The logical order, then, is first arbitration and next disarmament.

"As to the plan of arbitration, any compulsory system is at present utterly out of the question. There are so many international differences involving questions of race, religion, security, and even national existence, and the difficulty of drawing a line between these and questions which may properly be arbitrated is so insurmountable that there is not a nation on the face of the earth willing to risk an obligatory system. Far better, then, than any compulsory arbitration, which probably, even if it had been adopted by the conference, not one of the Powers would have finally ratified, is a thoroughly good system of voluntary arbitration, recourse to which public opinion will enforce more and more, and this I earnestly believe that the conference has presented to the world.

"Some of the features in the plan adopted were due to the United States, some to Great Britain, some to Russia, some to various other Powers; and, in my judgment, the plan thus adopted is far more valuable than any scheme presented by any one of the Powers at the beginning. The present plan is the result of most careful thought by the foremost international lawyers, statesmen and diplomatists of Europe, to say nothing of other parts of the world. They gave their whole souls to it, their pride was involved in it, and it will, I believe, be found to work satisfactorily.

"The great point gained is that whereas formerly an arbitration court could only be provided after long correspondence between Cabinets, and negotiations between ministers, and debates in Parliamentary bodies, and hunting for proper judges, and discussions as to procedure and a thousand other delays, just when time was most precious, the conference has given to the world an arbitration tribunal as an actual and permanent institution with judges, procedure, officers of the court, place of meeting and accessories all provided. It has added as subsidiary to its main feature carefully systemized plans of mediation, both general and special, which are likely in many cases to prove exceedingly valuable in preventing nations from drifting into war. As to gradual disarmament, that will come later. Of course the people who insist on having fruit on the day the tree is planted, will sneer at our work, but history will, I believe, judge it differently."

Christian Workers at the Seashore

A convention of Christian Workers was held recently on Bell Island, Conn. Rev. William James invited several clergymen and friends to meet the inmates of the Elim House on the Island, and a large number responded. The meetings were held in a tent and continued ten days. Dr. Wilton Merle Smith and Rev. R. H. Baker, of New York; Rev. W. H. Hubbard, of South Norwalk; Rev. J. H. Hoyt, of New Canaan, and Mrs. Sarah J. Bird were among the speakers.

Christian Temperance Union, has been making a tour of the United States in the interests of the Women's Temple, Chicago, to advance the cause of temperance. The Y. P. C. T. U. has been in existence less than two years; so rapidly has the movement spread that its membership lists now enroll hundreds of the most able and active young people of Chicago, including prominent officials in church societies, ministers, lawyers, physicians, teachers, newspaper editors and reporters; in fact almost every honorable vocation is represented in this army of Christian young people enlisted in the war against the saloon.

During her tour Miss Shontz has organized branches of the Y. P. C. T. U. in Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Colorado, and other States. She is a native of Iowa, and the child of parents who were temperance workers. She bears a remarkable personal resemblance to Miss Willard, is like her in being a graceful and earnest orator and a devoted advocate of an excellent cause. Her address on "Woman's Influence in Church Work," is on the programme of the services at the "Glad Tidings" Gospel Tent, New York City—the first woman on the list of speakers.

The Memorial to the Czar

We are daily receiving, by every mail, thousands of signatures to the Mammoth Memorial, now in course of preparation, for presentation to the Czar of Russia, congratulating that ruler, in the name of the Christians of the United States, upon the results of the late International Peace Congress, which was projected and carried out by the Czar in the face of the mightiest opposition and discouragement. When all the signatures have been received, the Memorial, finely engraved and enclosed in a unique and artistic casket with the names of the great army of signers appended—a roll of enormous proportions—will be forwarded to St. Petersburg and officially presented there.

Every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should, without fail, send in his or her signature, together with the signatures of as many friends and acquaintances as possible. The names should, by preference, be written clearly in ink, with full address, on white paper, eight inches wide, the sheets pasted or pinned together if one sheet should be insufficient to accommodate all the names secured by the sender. Send the names with as little delay as possible. Many friends of the peace movement have sent us over one hundred signatures. The present prospect is that the Memorial will have the largest number of signers of any great movement of the kind agitated in recent years. It should have at least a million names appended and this can be accomplished if all our readers and their friends, who are in sympathy with the movement to secure the world's peace, will secure as many signatures as possible. Every envelope containing such signatures should be distinctly marked, in the lower left-hand corner, "Czar's Memorial."

Starving Multitudes Clamoring for Food—Touching Scenes Among the Sufferers—All Looking to the United States for Aid

THE LANDING PLACE FOR ALL SUPPLIES AT PONCE

A STREET SCENE IN PONCE, NEAR THE CITY HALL

ADVICES by cable from Porto Rico during the past week indicate that the damage inflicted by the recent cyclone, far from being exaggerated in the earlier reports, are even more serious and widespread than at first believed. Telegraphic communication has been only partially restored, and dispatches now coming from the interior show that the whole island has been devastated. No town or village has wholly escaped the fury of the storm. In many places the greater part of the native population is without food and shelter. The receding waters have revealed several sad tragedies. Native dwellings are piled up in mounds of debris, and even public buildings have been wrecked in many places. In some towns, the only way in which the ruins can be cleared will be to consume the mass by fire. This is advised by the officials in charge, to avoid an epidemic. Frightful odors from decaying corpses fill the air, and carry the threat of coming pestilence. There are hundreds of putrefying bodies in the mud and under the timbers, and no laborers can be engaged to recover them or to clear the ruins.

In many cases, the destruction of towns and villages has been total. Nagabuo, Corozal, Aguada, Comerio and Guayanilla are among those that have been practically wiped out and the populations left destitute. The poor of Ponce are so numerous that the municipal authorities are powerless to relieve them, and the Mayor has resigned.

Steamers arriving in the port of San Juan, report seeing masses of refuse and bodies of human beings and cattle drifting about many miles out at sea. At Manabo, the town is absolutely leveled and over one hundred persons perished, many of them being little children. At Comerio, the surviving population is huddled in a large building—the only one left standing—and all the supplies have been destroyed. Thousands of villagers are camping in the mountains, and the valleys are still like lakes, with no signs of life.

At Corozal, the indigent crowds are piteously crying for bread, and no relief is yet in sight.

At Nagabuo, the remnant of the population is unsheltered and without food; and unless relief is extended to all of these places, the mortality from starvation and epidemic may exceed that caused by the flood itself.

Leading merchants of the island estimate the total loss on growing crops, stores in warehouses, and property generally at $75,000,000. The relief work, under government auspices, has already begun, but is inadequate, and needs to be promptly supplemented on a very large scale. In the Bayamon and Arecibo districts relief work is going on, but communication is still so much interrupted by the floods that Gen. Davis is placed out of reach of many of the most needy sections. Many perished in this quarter, and 200 bodies have already been recovered; but it is thought that hundreds of others have been washed out to sea. The towns were six feet under water, and when the flood subsided, corpses were found everywhere. The majority were buried where they were found. Our soldiers, under Capt. McComb, acted with great heroism, and rescued forty persons from drowning. Many natives are said to be starving at Naranciło. Cialis lost twenty by drowning. Borciloneta suffered still more heavily, and ninety perished. At Cayey, one of the most deplorable features of the disaster was the large number of women and little children who were lost in the flood. Their bodies have been recovered by hundreds, and the scenes are described as heartrending. Mothers died clasping their little ones in their arms. The children who escaped the deluge of waters may be swept off by hunger before relief comes. At Tabucoa, 200 perished and about eighty bodies have been found. There are many injured, and doctors, as well as food, are sorely needed.

Our soldiers at Ponce, as elsewhere, acted like real heroes, saving many at the risk of their own lives. Whilst the waters were still rushing like a flood, parties of American troops procured ropes and, binding themselves together, made a living line across the current, and saved many who were being carried down to certain destruction.

It should be stated, to the credit of the municipal authorities in different places, that the officials are using every endeavor to help the destitute, but with the means at their disposal they cannot do much. The military authorities also are generously sharing their supplies with the starving population. All that can be done through this means, however, is but a drop in the bucket. The situation demands relief on a vast and comprehensive scale, if life is to be saved. In many districts, scores of shelterless old men, women and little children are wandering about in pitiful helplessness, lamenting the loss of their earthly belongings and begging scraps of food "for the love of God!" In Utuado, the people have issued an appeal for food and work. It is said that thousands have perished in this district, yet only a pittance of relief has been received thus far.

It will be impossible for many days to determine the actual loss of life by the great cyclone, which swept the ill-fated island from its shore to its centre. Ponce is still stunned by the disaster. In the store-houses, thousands of sacks of sugar, coffee and other supplies were ruined by water, and shops and restaurants were swept bare of their contents. The water mains burst, spoiling the supply of drinking water, and for a time fresh water, the dispatches stated, could hardly be had for love or money. Even the largest buildings—some of wood and others of corugated iron—were twisted and battered. The stoutest structures were undermined and clothing and furniture were water-soaked and rotted. Timber, trees and all vegetation were levelled with the ground, and so were cane-fields for miles around. Latest advices estimate the number of identified dead in Ponce at 544. There are over one hundred natives in the hospital suffering from serious injuries. The whole beautiful valley of Juana, down to the sea, is a ruin; trees, houses, sand-piles, dead bodies of cattle scattered everywhere, and the roads obliterated. Enough carts cannot be hired to remove the decaying matter. A few streets have been cleared up and opened. Food is still scarce and at famine prices, and the people are looking eagerly forward to the arrival of aid from the United States. Officials believe that the island as a whole, cannot recover from the blow in less than two years, and that poverty and distress will prevail for months to come. During the week a number of sympathetic letters have been received, containing contributions for the relief work in Porto Rico. It is a cause which deserves the most cordial aid from all our readers and we trust that our appeal, in behalf of the suffering mothers and children especially, may not pass unheeded. The following sums have been received for its relief work during the past week:

The Heroism of Madame Dreyfus

AS the Captain Dreyfus trial re-opens all the world listens. His behavior has been transcendently beautiful. The publication of his letters to his noble wife reveals the secret of his freedom and coming triumph. They stood together and cheered each other. They determined never to succumb nor surrender to the infamous wrong, which in the name of military justice had been inflicted upon him and his household.

The wife of Sir John Franklin sought to rescue the secret of her husband's fate from the ice prisons of the pole. More successful than she, Madame Dreyfus, without whom probably her persecuted husband would have died in despair, comes from the well-named Isle of the Devil, bringing her delivered husband in triumph. If she had for one moment faltered, if she had for one moment doubted the justice of God, if she had for one moment discredited the noble heroism of the man, who had been given to her, as a husband, Captain Dreyfus' cause would have been lost.

We read incredible stories from the pen of such men as Hall Caine, we have recounted to us the imaginary machinations of a Hugh Ritson, who causes the false imprisonment of his own brother. But, here, the highest officers of an army enter into the most cruel combination to wreck the character and happiness of an innocent family. Their deed is consummated. But the heart of this true woman is an altar, where daily sacrifices are offered and daily pleadings are heard. Her feet are as wings, her tongue is as that of the advocate, and so against a nation, she prevails. The whole world rejoices, and writes her name among the great heroines of the ages.

A Dog and His Master

A MAN thirty-six years of age, who had been drinking, lately shot himself on Avon Avenue, Newark, N. J. His faithful dog was found watching by his lifeless body. The antithesis between a man created in God's image, who gets desperate because of the dominion of an evil habit, and throws up his commission, snuffs his life out as a candle, and his dog, who will not surrender his trust, even though his master is no longer living, is awfully suggestive.

We might almost reverse the Saviour's words: "How much is a brute better than a man!" Is man the great failure in creation? Is man the only being not true to creation's trust? What brute admits a thief into his mouth that steals away his brains? The dog knows his owner, even though stretched in death's silence by his own murderous hand. The dog still acknowledges the tie that binds him to man. Man forgets the tie that binds him to God; tramples it underfoot; first destroys God's image in himself by strong drink, makes himself infuriate, and then blows out his brains; desecrates and destroys the temple where God takes up his residence. What a picture for a drinking man to look at!

A Conspicuous Mark

EARL SIMPLERS, a well-known young athlete and swimmer, was a few days ago struck by lightning as he stood upon a pier ready poised for a dive. As the workmen on the dock hurried to the spot to lift up the unfortunate young man, a second stroke fell near them, and for the moment arrested them in their benevolent intent. Our Saviour cautions us against misinterpreting such an event as this. Here, certainly, was no violation of natural law. It was a remarkable coincidence that brought this young man to the spot where death was to be lightning-winged.

The tower in Siloam falls upon its unsuspecting victims. It is not to prove that they are either more or less sinners than all others; only to remind us that we are all sinners: and both deserve the penalty of sin and are liable to it. This young man was a college graduate, bore a good reputation, and, had he lived, promised to make a good record in life. He was a shining mark, selected not in anger, but in love; not to show that God is a God like the Jupiter of the ancients, sitting among his thunderbolts and hurling them from the sky, but a God not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. One shall be taken and another shall be left. Why taken? Perhaps, to show ten thousand young men the uncertainty of life; perhaps, to inspire ten thousand young men with new purposes in life. If so, Earl Simplers has not died in vain.

Men With Level Heads

IT ought not to be regarded a strange thing that we find vigorous and successful minds in America public and private life arraying themselves on the side of Christianity. It is a thing perfectly natural. President McKinley is there. It is the secret of his serenity and vitality. How could he have taken on him such burdens, been at once at the head of the army and navy, at the head of the Cabinet, the counselor of all lawmakers, ambassadors and peace-makers, fulfilled in himself the various trying functions of our chief executive, without believing in Christianity, without trusting in the living God? The cleansing fire of the Civil War made a Christian of President Lincoln. But McKinley came to his high place of trust a praying man.

All great business enterprises are best managed by praying men, believing men, men who can take their burdens to the Lord at the close of the day's work; can unbend with their children, and leave all their anxieties at the foot of the Cross. Worldly minds ridicule the Christianity of such men as John Wanamaker; set it down to their effort to make merchandise of their religious profession, but godliness has the promise of this life, as well as of that to come. And when we see Christian men who act from religious principle, securing private confidence and public confidence, given great earthly opportunities and earthly honors, it should not cause us to wonder. It is God fulfilling his promise. It is God electing men who are fit; honoring those that honor him.

The Omnipotent Truth

ONE of the great foundations of social happiness and prosperity is truth. We know intuitively that we ought to speak it and to act it, being well aware that the very existence of society depends on that mutual confidence which can only spring from truth. Now the love of truth is the love of realities; the preference for facts, rather than opinions; for truth is like the sky, and opinions are but the clouds that drift across it. Therefore truth in our daily intercourse is an absolute correspondence of our words with facts, for an habitual looseness of thought hinders the speaking of truth; so then we should think of things and speak of things so that we may be able to say: "This is true on earth, and I believe it to be true in heaven."

Social violations of truth are exceedingly common, and, in the minds of many, are venial transgressions. Plenty of occasions occur in which we are apt to think a delicate laxity about truth—a rather moral thing. We fear to pain or to offend, to be uncourteous, to induce a quarrel, and prefer insincerity to social ill-feeling. How often we tell people that we are glad to see them, when we are not glad to see them! How often we treat pleasantly those whom we really dislike, and thus act as well as speak what is not true! In the course of a single day we are constantly put between the horns of this dilemma—the tenderness of our own conscience and the social courtesy which teaches us to defer our own claims to consideration for the feelings of others. Yet the divine principle within us never consents to this shuffling, shuffling expediency. It never, under any circumstances, allows a lie to be justifiable, and we ourselves are uneasily conscious that something of our best manhood and womanhood is soiled by it. To do evil that good may come is a principle that can always be turned into wrong, as well as right. There is no immutable goodness in it. It may be said that to care for the feelings of others above our own content of moral conscience is in itself a kind of virtue. No; we do not carry this principle through all our life. If it touches our purse, our business, our integrity, our good name, our love, our social standing, we are quite ready to speak truthful words, however unpleasant they may be. Therefore it can not be right to sacrifice a great principle for a trifle of social consideration, when we would not do so for a selfish one.

There is a higher point of view, to which all such questions should be referred—what is the best rule, not for our petty circle, but for the whole world; not what is good for our friends or ourselves, but what is good for humanity as a whole. For the cause of truth is the cause of humanity. Even as regards ourselves, we have the plain Apostolic injunction, "Lie not one to another." For Truth is not only a virtue, it is the virtue, a thing required in all we do, an indispensible element in that success which is the object of every real life to achieve. If we could only realize that every honest calling is a part of a great general dispensation, then truth would be viewed as the highest centre and obligation; and every deviation from it, like a mistake in a sum, which if not set right, will repeat itself in a thousand ways, and far and wide affect, not only the guilty parties, but those innocent and ignorant of the error. Truth is as necessary to the social welfare of the race as oxygen is to the circulation of the blood.

There is an unfailing instinct in this matter, a sensitiveness which is only finally killed by constant and long-repeated violations. There are few little children who do not resent the imputation of a lie, and young men and women know so well the value and virtue of truth, that they feel any doubt of their truthfulness to be an indelible stamp upon their honor. Yea, humanity, as a whole, is not slow to admire even that superhonesty, which prefers death to a deliberate lie.

No modern teacher has so emphasized the power of truth as Carlyle. His life of Frederick the Great is built upon this virtue. He is never weary of telling us about Frederick's "veracity," his power of seeing things as they were, and his consciousness that error—no matter what plausable face it wore—could never be good. This faculty he declares to be the rarest and highest, not only of personal, but of intellectual virtues, since he assumes that no one can habitually speak and act the truth, unless they habitually think the truth, and to habitually think the truth shows the mind to be controlled by a strong, pure soul, having the fear of God before it continually. But even Carlyle, in this fine definition of a great character, has not made clear a very important difference between veracity and truth. Veracity—the quality which Frederick possessed so largely—is a correspondence between thoughts and words. Truth is a correspondence between thoughts and realities. A man is veracious when he says what he thinks. A man is truthful when his thoughts are facts. The Bible tells us of men who put sweet for bitter, and bitter for sweet; who called good evil, and evil good; yet these men were veracious men, for to them sweet was bitter, and good was evil, and they said truly what they thought. There was a perfect correspondence between their thoughts and their words, but there was eternal divergence between their thoughts and immutable and everlasting facts. Therefore they were untruthful men. The Pharisees were veracious when they thought Christ was an impostor, and they said so. They thought they were better than publicans and sinners and they said so, and yet Christ called them "ye hypocrites," for they were leading a life at variance with the truth—which is reality—a life the Disciple John plainly called "a lie."

Truth is something positive; it is not only the absence of impurity, but it is a clear, shining whiteness. Intellectual truth is clearness of thought, with clearness of statement, and moral truth is absolute fact, expressed with absolute fairness and unreserve—honest, straightforward speaking of the whole mind. It is not what we call frankness, for frankness is a disposition, not a principle. It is not what we call bluntness, for bluntness takes a direct pleasure in saying disagreeable things. Truth says disagreeable things when necessary, but it takes no pleasure in the saying of them. Truth is not blind to faults, but also it is not blind to virtues. Truth insists on facts, but under that name it does not put only the faults of acquaintances. Christ did not soften down the truth, for the rich young man he loved. He told him plainly what one thing he lacked, but he did not deny him the merit of keeping the law and the commandments. He spoke the truth to him, but he spoke it in love. And when the woman of Samaria would have entangled him in an old theological quarrel about places of worship, he cut the conversation short by the utterance of an undisputed truth, "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in Spirit, and in truth."

That truth is strong and will prevail is one of the most comforting assurances of mankind. But truth has to penetrate society variously colored, and influenced by views of its own, about both this world and the next, and quite resolved to abide by them. All new thought then—no matter how true it is—resembles a force whose object is to shake the society it enters. Hence the opposition and martyrdom that prophets of truth always meet; for wherever truth touches human life, its "prevailing" depends greatly upon the temper and condition of those who are to receive it. However, one thing is certain in the end—time and truth are sure to be friends.

Mr. Charles N. Crittenton has been holding services in Seattle, Wash. He succeeded in forming a Rescue Circle for the reclamation of fallen women. The Circle has raised a fund for the purchase of a house suitable for a Florence Mission. Mr. Crittenton has given a thousand dollars toward the amount required.

A Scottish minister stipulates before performing a marriage ceremony that no alcoholic stimulant shall be drunk at the wedding feast. This has been his practice for twenty-five years, and during that time only six couples declined to give the promise. They were obliged to go to some other clergyman to be married.

The New York Rescue Band has opened quarters at No. 309 West Fifty-third Street, near a police station, with a reading room and a library. The usefulness of the organization has been still further extended by the acquisition of an orphanage, a working girls' vacation home and a winter sanitarium at Upper Nyack, N. Y.

The report of the British and Foreign Bible Society, shows that the number of Bibles, Testaments, and portions of Scripture issued by it during the past year, reached the enormous total of over 4,479,000 copies. The total issues of the society since its foundation in 1804, have been over 160,000,000 copies. Translations and revisions are now going on in over one hundred languages.

A movement to promote a better observance of the Lord's Day has been inaugurated at Seattle, Wash. It was begun by the Christian Endeavor Societies and the Young People's Temperance Union. Church members of all denominations are uniting in the movement. It is hoped that at least it will result in closing the theatres and saloons, which now regard Sunday as their busiest day.

Harnessing the Nile

PEACE, we are told, hath victories as great as those of war. One illustration of the fact is presented in the picture on this page. No matter what may be thought of England's right to occupy Egypt, everyone must rejoice in the progress of the gigantic engineering work she has in hand in that country. To arrest and hold up the historic Nile and to turn the life-giving waters into the desert, which now run uselessly to the sea, is an achievement worthy of a great nation. A glance at the map shows that the productive land of Egypt is limited to a double ribbon running down the banks of the Nile. Every year the river overflows its banks, depositing on the land on each side a stratum of rich mud, from which the most bountiful crops are grown. But where the Nile does not reach, the land is arid and barren, for Egypt is practically rainless. As already mentioned in these columns (April 20, 1898), plans have been prepared for the construction of a gigantic reservoir at Assuan and a smaller dam at Assiout, by which the waters of the Nile will be stored and conveyed by canals to the desert. The picture here given shows the progress which had been made with the work at Assiout when the labor was suspended a few weeks ago. The Nile flood is now rising, and in a few days the works will be submerged, and will be under water for three or more months. After the river subsides, work will be resumed, and it is expected that by 1903 it will be completed. The dam will be about forty feet wide, affording bridge facilities to the people. It will be in places, seventy-five feet high and a mile and a quarter long. Its gates will have to resist the pressure of two hundred and fifty billion gallons of water. The contractors are to receive a total sum of twenty-four million dollars for their work. It is computed that the value of the land which will thus be added to the produce-bearing soil of Egypt will be at least one hundred million dollars, and that at a moderate estimate not less than two million dollars additional revenue will come every year to the national treasury from the proceeds of taxation on the new wealth. It is a singular fact, vouched for by Frederic C. Penfield, formerly United States Consul in Egypt, on the testimony of antiquaries, that such an engineering work was planned by Joseph thirty-six hundred years ago, when he was Prime Minister of Egypt, and that he actually constructed a dam as an experiment, which fertilized the province of Fayum. Mr. Penfield's article on the subject in the Century magazine explains the effect of this experiment. As the cost of the work will be repaid many times over by the products of the soil it will fertilize, it is extraordinary that so long a period should have been suffered to elapse before Joseph's scheme was put in execution. It shows how much better this time is than was that when in the same land stupendous engineering works were undertaken in building the Pyramids. This work is done that the people may have bread. It is a prophecy of that still better time of which the ancient seers wrote:

The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose (Isa. 35: 1).

CONSTRUCTION OF THE GREAT DAM AT ASSIOUT, EGYPT, FOR HOLDING BACK THE NILE

A Wife's Claim for Wages

A novel suit is set down for hearing at the next term of the Supreme Court in Jersey City, N. J. It is brought by a woman who was divorced about ten years ago, against her former husband. They had been married twenty years when they quarreled and both filed suits for divorce. The husband's suit was successful and a decree was granted. The children of the marriage were confided to the husband and the care of them proved an embarrassing charge. After one or two unhappy experiments with housekeepers, he proposed to his divorced wife that she come and take charge of his home and family as his housekeeper. For the sake of the children, she consented, and this extraordinary arrangement continued until this year. The children have now grown up and all of them have married and left home. Their father has decided to give up housekeeping and go to boarding. Having no further occasion for his divorced wife's services as housekeeper, he discharged her. During her years of service, she alleges, he gave her no compensation and she therefore sues for a thousand dollars which she considers she is entitled to, for her labor. It may be hoped she will be successful; but she would doubtless have been better pleased if her former husband had condoned the past and made her again his wife. It is this that gladdens the heart of the Christian whom God forgives for his wandering. He is restored to his former place in his Lord's love.

They shall be as though I had not cast them off: for I am the Lord their God and will hear them (Zech 10: 6).

A House Afloat

The residents of upper New York along the banks of the Harlem were astonished a few days ago to see a two-and-a-half-story frame cottage float up the river with the flood tide. The cottage was nicely balanced upon a large sand scow. That it was occupied was evidenced by the smoke that was coming out of the roof where the chimney should have been, and by a good-sized washing hanging from a clothesline stretched from the second-story window to the flagpole of the scow. A small tug was towing the scow. On reaching the foot of Lincoln avenue the scow, with its novel load of freight, was docked. Then the captain of the scow told his story. The cottage had stood for several years at the foot of Delancey street. Recently the owner decided to move to Jamaica Bay, and after consulting several house movers, learned that no great difficulty stood in the way of moving the old house to the new site. Accordingly the house was moved from the dock, and from there transferred to the scow, being rolled on heavy timbers placed from the dock to the deck of the boat. The house was then lashed fast with heavy ropes and the trip to Harlem begun. Shortly before dark the tug once more started down the river with the scow, to continue the trip around Coney Island to Jamaica Bay. When a house can be taken bodily so long a distance, it is no longer appropriate to use it as a type of permanence and stability. Few persons have occasion thus to remove their houses, but all would be happier if, remembering the changes in human life, they could say as did the Psalmist:

Thy statutes have been my song in the house of my pilgrimage (Psa. 119: 54).

A Bellamy Colony

The little town of Morehead, in northwest Kansas, is making an experiment of the principles outlined in Edward Bellamy's famous work, Looking Backward. There are about five or six hundred persons in the colony. These are all living on a co-operative plan. The proceeds of the farms are turned into a common treasury, and in the town there are a cannery factory, a bakery, a restaurant, a hotel, a laundry and other enterprises, all belonging to the community. Each has a superintendent who keeps an account of expenditure and results and presents an annual statement. The community is prospering and is making arrangements to extend the co-operative principle so that there shall be no occasion for the use of money at all. The tailor, the dry-goods merchant, the printer, the physician, the blacksmith will all perform their functions without pay, simply charging against the common account the value of the services rendered and each having the privilege of being so served by the others. The experiment will be watched with interest for it implies an ideal confidence, one in another, on the part of the citizens and a conviction that each will act honorably in working for the general good of the community. It is a reminder of that happy time in which the Christian church started, when every Christian regarded every other as his brother:

The multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things in common (Acts 4: 32).

Across Africa

The French Geographical Society has just conferred its gold medal on M. Edouard Foa, in recognition of his brilliant march across Africa, from Mozambique, on the east, to the Gulf of Guinea, on the west. This is a more northerly route than was taken in 1891 by Dr Johnston, the West Indian missionary, whose portrait and life were published in these columns on his return. M. Foa set out on his long journey with two friends and about four hundred armed natives and carriers; but one of his friends succumbed to fatigue before reaching Lake Nyassa and the other broke down at Tanganyika. M. Foa proceeded alone with his native convoy and, according to his story, met with many strange adventures. Lovers of the marvelous will have a rare treat when his book, which is being translated into English, is published. Baron Munchausen would have envied him could he have read it. This doughty Frenchman claims to have killed no less than forty elephants on his way, and one of them, being more than four yards in height, would have struck terror to the heart of anyone but a Frenchman. The tusks of this beast weighed 113 pounds and were worth $1,400. We hope M. Foa was able to get them to the coast, so as to confirm his story. He also killed rhinoceros, hippopotami and other big game in large numbers. He incidentally discovered the true sources of the Congo, met with races of cannibals that no other explorer had ever seen, and made the acquaintance of a tribe who had the reprehensible habit of cutting off their own noses, etc., which, in a metaphorical sense, some of M. Foa's own countrymen appear to be doing nearer home. M. Foa was thirty-eight months on his journey and considering the number of adventures he relates and the achievements he claims to have made, the time must have been a busy, as well as a lively one. We have undoubtedly reached the time foreseen by the ancient prophet:

M. EDOUARD FOA

Many shall run to and fro and knowledge shall be increased (Daniel 12: 4).

To Give Durability

A scientific journal calls attention to the fact that the curious and well-known by-product of zinc, chloride or salts of zinc, which formerly went to waste, is now being largely used as a wood preservative by railroads, bridge-builders, dock-builders, and for the protection of shingles, clapboards, and any other wood that is exposed to moisture or influences productive of decay; the salts of zinc, in solution, by means of hydraulic pressure are forced into the pores of the wood, which is then soaked in a solution of tannin and glue. The singular fact is stated that, with this simple treatment, a railroad-tie made from a pine tree—which is the only kind that can be found out in the mountain country—will last three times as long as one of oak. The infusion produces a durability that the wood naturally does not possess, and enables it to resist the processes of decay. It is so with the natural man. When God imparts his Spirit to his child the weak becomes strong.

Out of weakness were made strong (Heb. 11: 34).

A Mechanical Shouter

Among the curious inventions which have been submitted to the government since the trouble with Spain is one which was tested in Washington a few days ago. A reporter of the New Orleans Times-Democrat, who was present at the test, says: "It is a tube about four inches in length and about three in diameter. Stretched across the aperture is a piece of perforated rawhide, and when blown into emits a strange and blood-chilling howl—something absolutely indescribable in words—a sort of cross between the shriek of a buzz-saw when it strikes a nail and the lower register of an adult steam calliope. It is the sort of noise I imagine a hippopotamus might make during an attack of membranous croup." The inventor points out that the yell of troops when they charge frequently demoralizes the foe, and his invention is designed to make this yell more terrifying. The War Department has declined to avail itself of this novel instrument. In these days soldiers must fight for the victory, though the time is coming in which the Lord himself will overthrow his enemies and then shouting over the triumph will be the part of his people.

Let the inhabitants of the rock sing; let them shout from the top of the mountains (Isa., 42:11)

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

Happy Childhood Times

Youthful Anglers Merry Journeys—Delightful Story-Telling

FEW of our readers but will feel a sympathetic throb of pleasurable interest in the occupation of the two lads in the picture. Was there ever a boy or a girl who did not like to go a-fishing? Happily, the fun of fishing consists not solely in catching fish. Various angling excursions, guiltless of finny captives, are very pearls of memory to many of us, bringing back, by association, the dear old homestead and its loving company. A kind father, or elder brother, was companion and guide. Excitement began the day before the start, when we were busy getting hooks and lines and bait ready—if the trout had only known what refreshments would be theirs on the morrow at comparatively little risk, they would have laughed with delight!—if a trout can laugh. On the eventful day, we were up and off betimes, feeling very important as we trudged along through flowery fields and found ourselves in woodland ways under dew-laden branches. Birds were flitting about and singing overhead; callow nestlings turned gaping mouths upon us when we peeped curiously into Mrs. Wren's or Mrs. Mockingbird's home, with the kind intent of giving hungry babies a treat out of the bait-can—which generous purpose came to nought, because of the angry screams of unappreciative mammas and our guardian's warning call: "Come away! You may show a prowling cat that nest!" Presently, short legs got tired of long tramping; we sat around our guide at rest on a green bank and he told us stories, and whittled whistles for us with his jack-knife; and when we had the whistles, we set up opposition to the birds. Perhaps, too, we all sang a merry chorus, when it was great fun to hear the echoes the woods sent back to us. The tramp, at last, ended at the stream.

We baited our hooks, and watched for the bite—which didn't come, although we repeatedly drew up our hook to find the bait gone. Again, the cork went down, the line pulled hard, we squared ourselves for a mighty jerk—when behold! we perceived that the hook was caught fast in driftwood, the root of a tree or a tangle of vines. Lunchtime and appetite were sure, however, and equally sure were the cookies mother had put in the basket with the sandwiches. Equally sure, too, were the stories after—stories of the fisher-folk of Galilee, with whom our Saviour loved to walk and talk; Christ asleep in the boat, Peter walking on the water; the miraculous draught of fishes; the little supper by the sea, when loving disciples met their risen Lord—were made very real to us. In the cool dusk as we walked homeward, we picked berries to take to mother in place of the fish we hadn't caught.

FISHING IN SUMMER TIME IN THE OLD MILL-POND ON THE FARM

A Sick Child's Prayer

Some of us have known sick-rooms which were like gateways to heaven, because of the patient, loving and cheerful spirit of the sufferer. The following story shows a patience that it is almost worth being sick to win: A little boy was suffering one night from a severe cold. He had coughed violently for some time, sitting up in bed, and was unable to sleep. He didn't know anyone was listening to him, but finally, when he was quite worn out, he prayed aloud in these beautiful words: "O God, make me well right away. But you needn't hurry too much, for I can be very patient." His faith, as well as patience, are worthy of desire.

Time to be Loving

What does it profit us, mother, if we have gotten our house clean from top to bottom, the meals on time and the husband's and children's clothes in order, if to accomplish it we have wounded people right and left and missed opportunities of showing the spirit of love and gentleness?

What does it profit you, father, if through concentration upon your business, you make lands and houses and provide fine raiment and rich food for your wife and children, yet let them starve for a husband and father's affection? Industry and thrift are most commendable and service is one of the best ways of showing love, but if in service we forget love, service loses its highest virtue.

Yaqui Customs

The Yaqui Indians, whose uprising in Mexico has attracted recent attention, are a very primitive people, holding to their ancient pagan faith and their ancestral ceremonial rites of birth, marriage and burial, fasts and feasts. Their homes are thatched huts without doors. Corn is ground between two stones, while the visitor waits (Yaquis are very hospitable) for the toothsome tortilla, or pancake, which Mexicans make out of meal. On to the pancake, beans or stewed game will be ladled out of a pot of savory smell. When the beans or stew is eaten, one rolls the tortilla up and eats that, too. This cooking and feasting takes place out doors in front of the hut. Domestic implements are crude. Yaquis are intelligent, however. They have a sort of government of their own, and for a half-civilized people good military organization, using Winchester rifles in place of their lately discarded bows and arrows.

Little Soldier Boys

We publish this letter from Mrs. Florence C. Aldrich, a New Haven mother, telling how her little boy helped her, because the instance may carry comfort to some other mother: "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a much loved member of one small household in the City of Elms; and two small soldier boys, Carl and Clifford, find very great delight in your pictures—especially in those illustrating the Sunday School lesson—and in the stories for children. I want to tell how one little soldier taught me a lesson one dreary, stormy night last winter. It had been one of those days when everything would go wrong, and in the twilight I sat down and cried over the failures of the day. Carl and Clifford sat playing with blocks at my feet. Suddenly Carl looked up and said in his sweet voice: 'What is the matter, mamma? Is it a needless pain' mamma?' Surprised, I answered, 'What can you mean, my dear little boy?' And he said: 'Why, mamma, don't you know we sing

O! what peace we often forfeit,
O! what needless pain we bear!
All because we do not carry
Everything to God in prayer.

Is that the kind of a pain you have got, mamma?' I thought my little five-year-old boy had preached me a good sermon."

A Japanese Wedding

The marriage customs of different nations are always interesting. Those of Japan are quite odd. When a youth fixes his attentions upon a maid he fastens a branch of a certain shrub to the house of her parents. If the branch be neglected the suit is rejected; if it be accepted, so is the suitor. The bridegroom sends presents to his bride as costly as his means will allow, which she offers to her parents. The wedding takes place in the evening. The bride is dressed in a long white silk kimona and white veil, and she and her future husband sit facing each other on the floor. Two tables are placed close by: on the one is a kettle with two spouts; on the other table a miniature fir tree—signifying the strength of the bridegroom: a plum tree, signifying the beauty of the bride, and, lastly, a stork standing on a tortoise, representing long life and happiness desired by them both. At the marriage feast the two-spouted kettle is put to the mouths of the bride and bridegroom alternately by two attendants, signifying that they are to share together joys and sorrows. The bride keeps her veil all her life and after death it is buried with her as her shroud. The chief duty of a Japanese woman all her life is obedience—while unmarried, to her parents; when married, to her husband and his parents; when widowed, to her son.

THE "OLDEST SUBSCRIBER"

The Oldest Subscriber

A subscriber to this paper, Mr. Gerhart, sends us the accompanying picture of his little son, Nathaniel, posed as an "old subscriber." The two and a-half-year-old veteran, sitting on his chair, spectacles astride his nose, gazes intently at the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in whose pictures he is doubtless profoundly interested. Nobody will dispute the proposition that he has logic to back his claim of being considered "one of our oldest subscribers," since he "has taken the paper all his life," even if his countenance is not so venerable as might be expected from such a title.

A "Bible Birthday"

SHE was a Canadian teacher, away from home and kindred. When her birthday came, she had no idea that any one would remember it—she almost forgot it herself, except when thinking with a thrill at her heart of the morrow, when the mail would come and bring letters and little gifts from Canada. Her birthday had not been remembered at places where she had worked before. But Louise was among real Christians this time. When evening came, and they all walked into the dining-room, behold! over the snowy table-cloth fern leaves were scattered. In the centre of the table was a tall vase of roses. The best China was out; the napkins were folded in fanciful ways. At everybody's plate was a "favor"—and the favor was a little roll of grey satin paper tied with a bit of pink ribbon, into which a rose was caught. When they took their places, the Housemother leading, they sang:

Dear Lord, we thank thee for the goiden day,
That sent our sister unto us in love;
Bless her, dear Lord, make hers a shining way,
Love lighted from above.

Each untied the scroll at his or her plate, and read from thereon such lovely texts as: "The Lord bless thee and keep thee;" "The Lord make his face shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee." The meal was one of cheerfulness and kindness and merry talk. Dainties, that loving thought and service had contrived out of limited means, graced the board. Cookies and cottage cheeses, in pretty, garlanded bowls and platters, concluded a feast that the young stranger, whose birthday was being celebrated, would never forget.

A Queer Family

Mr. Bartlett, member of the British Zoological Society, told this story of a pair of ostriches under his observation. The male, which made the nest and covered the eggs for the sixty days necessary to hatching, would hardly leave his charge long enough to eat, and waxed thin with cares. Mrs. Ostrich walked around quarreling. Finding two eggs broken, Mr. Bartlett watched to discover "the hen deliberately walk up, and, with a scolding way, endeavor to force her faithful partner down upon the nest," which he was leaving for a nib of grass and his usual dessert of rusty nails or a similar dainty; a broken egg was the result of her meddling, and she was promptly exiled to the other side of the fence. When the striped babies came out of their shell and began to say, "Peep, peep," of course it was thought their mamma would like to see them. She caught the first baby that got to her by its neck and tossed it high in the air where it described a terrific somersault and came down half dead. She was exiled permanently, and the father, gentle, assiduous and attentive, scratched for his family and sheltered them until they were big birds.

Some of Our Little Guests

The Cripple—The Reform of "Rocky" Little Lass and Laddie

FRIENDS of our children who are cooperating with us in the good work of helping the tenement waifs, will be interested in the following account of some of our little guests. The history of hundreds of the children entertained are fully as sad as these, and the relief afforded and the change wrought, morally and physically, quite as great.

Henry, the little man sitting on the rocks, is a cripple. He is ten years old, and six of those years he has spent almost entirely in charity hospitals, where splints and various contrivances were employed to enable him to walk better. Henry limped cheerily into the Bible House the other day. "De doctors up to de hospital didn't know me when teacher tooked me in dere to-day ter see if me leg was gettin' along all right; an' me mudder —well, you jes' ought to see how 'sprised me mudder looked at me when teacher tooked me in to see her! Me mudder wuz glad! I ain't stayin' in town! Naw! I'se goin' back to de home wid de teacher. See!" Henry has been at the Fresh-Air Home much longer than ten days. The little fellow was very pallid, weak and emaciated when he was brought up, and because of his weakness, his limp was ten-fold worse. On the boat up he first drew "teacher's" attention to himself by laying a clinging hand on her skirts. She turned to see the cripple, smiling up bravely enough, but saying, pleadingly: "Please, teacher, may I hold on to you? Me leg is bad an' it drags an' de boys steps on it." Of course, teacher let him "hold on to her." His first night in the dormitory he nestled up to teacher, and said, referring to chapel service, to the words used in the little prayer he had just said, and to the name called in the stories teacher had been telling: "Teacher, who is Jesus?" The story of the Saviour was told to an eager little listener, who said, his eyes shining: "I will tell it to me mudder." A few days later Housemother Collins heard somebody limping along behind her, and as she turned, Henry laid loving hold on her, and said: "Miss Collins, let's set down on de grass and let's have a good, quiet talk about God and Jesus." Always brave, sweet and smiling, the little cripple has made himself a name at the Home. That name is "Our Sunshine."

Another interesting character is Rocco. "Rocky" is the apt soubriquet his playmates have given the young Irish Italian. Rocky startled the dining-room during his first meal by slamming a plate on the floor in a fit of passionate anger against another child—the only scene of the kind that has ever occurred in our dining-room, for our children are uniformly humble and grateful. Nobody threw back at him; the crowd was still with horror. A teacher, laying a firm but gentle hand on his arm, said kindly, "Come, Rocco." Up in the quiet dormitory, she sat him down in a corner with his face to the wall "to think." In about ten minutes duty called her off temporarily. She was detained a half hour and returned without the faintest idea of finding Rocky in place. But there he was, face to the wall, tears stealing down his cheeks. She drew the child's head on her breast, talked with him (and in the talk found that the child's father is a convict), and prayed with him. His next display of temper was not so violent; but she took him to the dormitory, talked and prayed with him, and gave him some tasks to do. The latter were faithfully performed; and not only that day, but voluntarily every day during his stay, the boy saying: "I like to help you, teacher." He was devoted to "teacher," following her everywhere and behaving so beautifully that he was in request in all the dormitories. The evening before his return to the city, teacher took him to the dormitory, and pointed silently to the corner where he had sat with his face to the wall. He understood; his face flushed; teacher knelt and prayed with him, and gave him a pretty book that would be helpful to him.

The little lass and lad by the tree were ailing, ragged, emaciated when they came to us; and as the picture shows, both are fat, happy and well clad now.

Contributions of Clothing

Our children's friends have been most kind in the matter of sending clothing. Many of the tenement waifs are very needy. Little boys who have never had a pair of good trousers or a good jacket in their lives are among our guests.

Packages of clothing have been received from the following: Edith and Ester, Fair Haven, Conn.; Rosebud Club, Batavia, N. Y.; Center Haverhill Opportunity Circle of the King's Daughters and Sons, New Hampshire; Miss M. C. H. and Miss J. M. S., Carbondale, Pa.; I. H. N., from Dudley, and two suits from Mrs. Greely Brown and Mrs. Ida Chase.

They Love "The Christian Herald"

Mr. E. Edwards, of Newark, N. J., a long time reader of this journal, writes us as follows:

I think that I have good reason to feel the spirit of victory over the success of the last two months by sending one hundred new names for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It has been no small thing, and yet a great privilege to call at a thousand doors and look as many wives and mothers in the face.

While I had my hard and trying days, I also had my good times. From Arlington to West Orange I went—over ten miles in the hot sun. I am now going to give thanks and praise. I should have said that I expect to get a number of names this coming Fall.

One hundred new subscribers secured by one person in two months is a record of which the worker may well be proud. It is one, moreover, that should stir others to similar effort to place their favorite religious weekly in as many homes as possible.

A NEW RHEUMATIC REMEDY.

A prominent physician writes:

SPOTSWOOD, N. J.

DEAR SIRS:—Please send me, by mail, four more bottles of TARTARLITHINE.

I will also here state, in justice, that this is the most welcome remedy that has come into my hands since my beginning of the practice of medicine. It has given me, in every case of rheumatism in which I have used it, the happiest kind of results. I have used discretion, perhaps even more than necessary, in its employment; that it be given to patients whose cases do not yield to ordinary treatment, old chronic cases of gouty diathesis, where there is a tendency to calcareous deposits, etc. These are undoubtedly the most troublesome patients to give what might fairly be termed good results. Now these have been the very kind in which I have been using Tartarlithine with the very happiest results to patients and myself. Many valuable remedies come daily to our aid, but this has been the most welcome one to me thus far.

Yours very truly,

A LITTLE PEACE-MAKER

A Story in Two Parts, Written Expressly for "The Christian Herald" by

MARGARET E. SANGSTER

CHAPTER II.

A STUBBORN look, which Ethel had seen before, showed itself upon Hugh's countenance. His brow visibly blackened.

"I hope my mother will stay here as long as may suit her convenience," he said. "I can have no more welcome presense in our home than hers."

"Perhaps you were more comfortable when hers was the only presense—before you were married, I mean?" said Ethel.

"Rather more comfortable, my dear," said Hugh; "but I beg your pardon. My mother was in the ranks of the workers until I left college, and I was with her alone, all told, only a year. These bickerings of ours are absurd. Bear in mind what I said about baby, won't you?"

"I shall forget nothing," answered Ethel.

Downtown, sitting in his office and engaged with the multiform demands which press their claims upon the attention of a business man, Hugh seldom had much leisure or inclination to think about home. Is not this always so? The husband and father toils with hand and brain unremittingly to provide for his dear ones, but he does not dwell consciously all day long on the love he bears them. It is there, though, all the same, and a very strong and compelling force it is in his life—the background of everything he does.

Ethel's sweet face, dimmed by resentment, mentally opposed itself to Hugh's usual complacency, after he had left her. There is no worse beginning for any man's day than a misunderstanding with his people at home, most of all with his wife. By degrees the conviction settled upon him that he was not a gentleman in his conduct to Ethel, scolding her and losing his temper and interfering in her province; and Hugh had the grace to feel very much ashamed of himself.

"When I was her lover and not her husband," the poor fellow said in his thought, gloomily surveying his ledger, where the black figures, in their long straight columns, stared at him like so many witches, "i never spoke to Ethel except affectionately. I was always trusting her judgment, always complimenting her; and now I am learning to act like a cad. And, bless my heart and soul, tomorrow is the dear girl's birthday!"

Once having recalled her birthday, Hugh decided to lay a peace-offering on its altar, and to buy for his wife the most welcome birthday gift he could think of. He knew that she wanted a set of blue china, of a forget me-not pattern. She had admired and wished for this for a long time, and when he left the office for the day he stopped and bought this and ordered it sent home. Then he called at the florist's and purchased a bunch of white and pink carnations—Ethel's favorite flower; and so, faring homeward with a lighter heart than he had carried away in the morning, he ran up his own steps at last, and let himself in with his latch-key.

"Hugh!" called Ethel over the banisters. "Come up very softly, dear. Baby is ill. He has had a convulsion."

Hugh's anxiety was equal to hers when anything serious ailed their little son. "Have you had the doctor?" he asked. "What caused it? Is he better now?"

"We don't know what caused it; he was in it a long while; as black as your hat, and Doctor Frank was here for two hours. But he is quiet now, and dear Mamma, most fortunately, came to help me enjoy my birthday, and she has him now."

Hugh had to acknowledge, when he saw Mrs. Dana handle the baby, that she knew more about little children than his mother did, and it was an unspeakable comfort to see how deft and capable was her management, to hear her voice, to watch her as she moved about, the born nurse, efficient and clever, and knowing what to do.

Madam Mainwaring came into the nursery, looking pale and shaken. Her face was drawn as if with pain, she shivered and seemed forlorn. Her daughter-in-law went up to her and gently took her cold, unresisting hand in a firm clasp.

"You are used up, mater. You must not be worried any longer. Baby is out of danger now, and mamma is here; that alone makes me feel safer than I could without her."

"Yes, thank God!" ejaculated the stately Madam Mainwaring, and she stopped and kissed Mrs. Dana's plump cheek.

So it came to pass that for that time at least, the baby was a little peace-maker. The two older women, in many ways antagonistic, laid their differences aside and became as one over the flaxen haired, blue-eyed, dimpled grandchild, who was to both an idol, and the pledge of God's goodness to them in showing them the second generation.

"Hugh," said Ethel, blushing, as on her birthday she unpacked the for-get me-not china, "I have a confession to make to you, and perhaps when you hear it you will say that I do not deserve this exquisite present. When you left me yesterday I was so angry that I made up my mind to go home to mamma and stay with her a long while. I packed my trunk, and telegraphed my train, and I was going without saying good bye to you."

"Oh, Ethel!"

"Yes; but mamma answered my despatch with another, 'Don't come, house closed, on my way to you.' The curious thing was that she had had a dream about baby and me which worried her. Dear mamma is a person who has dreams and warnings and she could not rest, and just as the poor wee Mannie was taken ill, in she walked, like an angel of mercy."

"I need never have known your intention, wifie, if you had not told me so candidly," said Hugh. "Now, let me, in my turn, tell you that I was ashamed all day of my moroseness yesterday, and, God helping me, I vowed not to pain you so again. And Ethel darling, I see just what it is: you and I never have any friction when we are by ourselves, but we each have made the mistake of letting our feelings toward our mothers allow a disturbance of our peace. From this time on I shall be man enough never to say an impatient word about Mrs. Dana, who is far too good for me to criticize."

"Don't make rash promises, Hugh," said Ethel, with a light of mischief in her eyes. "You will do your best, I will do mine, and we will learn anew the fifth Commandment. We'll forgive one another now and ask God's blessing, and try to be good."

The two ladies, in the nursery, watching with delightful eyes the little one, who, though wan and languid, bore no other trace of his sudden attack of spasms, were also exchanging pledges.

"Mrs. Dana," said Madam Mainwaring, "I am going to South Dakota to visit my sister Emily, whom I have not seen in twenty years. The journey is long and expensive and I shall not return for two years. I have had my eyes opened. Dearly as I love my son Hugh, I cannot stay here any longer just now, to make trouble between him and his wife. I have been a troublesome old woman, and I am sorry. This dear baby though, pulls at my heart strings. How shall I give him up for such an age?"

"Madam Mainwaring," answered Mrs. Dana, "I have a cousin in San Francisco, a cousin Belle, who has had a heap of trouble, lost her mother and her husband, and is drifting into nervous prostration. She needs somebody to stand by her, without an hour's delay, and I'm the only one who can go to her relief. I can't make up my mind to stay away from this blessed baby two years, but I'll stay one year, and suppose you do the same. Let us meet here again on Ethel's birthday a year from now.

THE END.

Cast Down, But Not Destroyed

WHY art thou cast down, my soul,
Why so disquieted?
Hope thou in God, thou yet shalt praise
The hand that sanctifies these seasons' ways.
Thy stumbling feet have led.

What though fresh troubles, like a cloud,
Thy sky hath overcast!
Though disappointments mar thy lot,
Thy Father's love, which changes not,
Will make it bright at last.

This life is but a trial hour,
A pilgrimage at best.
It may be that the heaviest load,
The darkest sky, the roughest road
Lead to the sunniest rest.

And when from Beulah's hills reviewed,
Thou thankfully shalt see
How brighter paths, but lured astray,
While this same crooked, thorny way
Led straight to victory.

Oh, to be patient in the fire!
God's hottest furnace blast!
Calmly to smile and sweetest sing,
And meekly bend to His sweet will Assurd of peace at last.

An Early Endeavorer

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Sept. 10.

II. Timothy, 3: 10–17

CHANGES in private and public life and in the world around us have been numerous since Paul wrote these last injunctions to his young disciple; but an old man, concerned for the welfare of a beloved son, might use the same words at this day with the same purpose. The course the apostle indicated is still the safe course. It is still true that an evil man does grow worse. Many instances could be quoted in modern life in which the deceiver ends by becoming a dupe. The way to escape such deterioration is still that of abiding in the things of God, and we are still able to point to the people from whom we learned them, as people whose lives encouraged us to tread the path in which they walked. In spite of all our discoveries and all our learning and all the advantages in education that we possess, no better way has ever been found for bringing a young man safely through the temptations and trials of life than this, that he make the things of God, which he learned of his pious kindred, so thoroughly his own that he may be said to abide in them, to live in them, to transform them into conduct, and to make them the governing principles of his life. There is a beautiful pathos in this address. The old man so enthusiastic, so devoted, so full of energy, yet conscious that the period of his service is drawing to a close, and now anxious, above all things, that the hand which shall carry the torch when he drops it shall be strong and steady. "Abide thou in the things which thou hast learned."

A very notable feature of these injunctions is the emphasis Paul lays on the duty of Bible study. He urges this in the strongest and most impressive terms. In these days when the Old Testament is the object of assault, the injunction is very significant. It is the Old Testament to which Paul refers, for, excepting his own epistles, which the Apostle would not be likely to call "sacred writings," little, if any, of the New Testament could have been in Timothy's hand as a child. Paul is writing to a Christian minister and he urges him to study the Old Testament, which is able, when read with faith in Christ, to make him wise unto salvation. It is evident that Paul did not regard the Old Testament as obsolete. The new light which Christ brought had not cast the Book into shadow, but had illumined it. It was more full of meaning then than ever, and the student would find its teaching profitable for faith and conduct. The Revised Version, by changing the position of the verb in the sentence, implies discrimination in the reading. It does not say, as the Authorized Version does, "All scripture is inspired of God," but that, "Every scripture inspired of God is profitable," which is a different thing and is obviously true. The study of these writings will make "the man of God complete, furnished completely unto every good work." So it has been found in every generation. The men who do the most good in the world, the successful teachers and preachers have not always been men of erudition, but men saturated with Bible truth, men of one book which they find is, as Paul said, able to make them wise unto salvation, not their own only, but of those to whom they speak.

Thus we have the purpose and use of the Bible, Old Testament as well as new, stated in compact form. Other books are useful for teaching science or history, or for some other practical purpose; the Bible's use is to make men wise unto salvation. What higher object can the Young People's Societies aim at? There is so much in life to be saved from. To realize this fact we have only to look around us at the lives some middle-aged and old men are leading, to notice the evils that make men their victims; to listen to the sad stories that may be heard in all our cities, of men so bound by the chains of evil habit, so fettered by the bonds they have themselves forged by the sins of their youth, that nothing short of a miracle can deliver them from their misery; all this, which any thoughtful man can see and hear, must lead to the conviction that the greatest service that can be rendered him is to save him from such a fate. If the Young People's Societies do nothing more for their members than lead them to Bible study, they will have served a beneficent purpose. Not a mere study of words, not a puerile reverence for ancient myths and folk lore are what we should bring to the Bible, but a sincere desire to get from it such light on God's character—the God with whom we have to do—as shall enable us to live according to his will, so as to please him. That is, to fulfil the purpose of our being, to make the best of our lives. Never before in the history of the world has the Bible been so clearly understood as in our own day, and with the clearer light and the better understanding, it has proved more conclusively than ever that, as Paul said, it is able to make wise unto salvation all who incorporate its principles in their lives.

Out and Out for Christ

A young man enlisted and was sent to his regiment, writes Mr. Moody. The first night he was in the barracks with about fifteen other young men, who passed the time playing cards and gambling. Before retiring, he fell on his knees and prayed, and they began to curse him and jeer at him and throw boots at him. So it went on the next night and the next, and finally the young man went and told the chaplain what had taken place, and asked what he should do.

"Well," said the chaplain, "you are not at home now, and the other men have just as much right in the barracks as you have. It makes them mad to hear you pray, and the Lord will hear you just as well if you say your prayers in bed and don't provoke them."

For weeks after the chaplain did not see the young man again, but one day he met him, and asked, "By the way, did you take my advice?" "I did for two or three nights." "How did it work?" "Well," said the young man, "I felt like a whipped hound, and the third night I got out of bed, knelt down and prayed." "Well," asked the chaplain, "how did that work?" The young soldier answered: "We have a prayer-meeting there now every night, and three have been converted, and we are praying for the rest."

Let us be out and out for Christ; let us give no uncertain sound. If the world wants to call us fools, let them do it. It is only a little while; the crowning day is coming. Thank God for the privilege we have of confessing Christ.

A Blurred Vision

A friend of mine told me some years ago, writes a Christian minister, that his wife was very fond of painting, but that for a long time he never could see any beauty in her paintings; they all looked like a daub to him. One day his eyes troubled him, and he went to see an oculist. The man looked in amazement at him, and said: "You have what we call a short eye and a long eye, and that makes everything a blur." He gave him some glasses that just fitted him, and then he could see clearly. Then he understood why it was that his wife was so carried away with art, and he went and built an art gallery and filled it full of beautiful things, because everything looked so beautiful after he had had his eyes straightened out.

There are lots of people that have a long eye and a short eye, and they make miserable work of their Christian life. They keep one eye on the eternal city and the other eye on the well-watered plains of Sodom, and they have no happiness and enjoyment in either.

A Polar Explorer's Return

From Tromsoe, Norway, comes intelligence of the arrival there of the Wellman exploring party after a tragic experience in the Arctic ice fields. The expedition sailed from the United States a year ago, well equipped with all the appliances for a prolonged polar voyage. In the autumn of 1898 an outpost was established in Franz Joseph Land, and there, in a house of rocks roofed with walrus hide, two Norwegians—Bjoervig and Bentzen—were provisioned and left to pass the winter, while the main party wintered in a canvas hut at Cape Teghetoff on Halls Island. Bentzen died of exposure, but Bjoervig was unharmed by his experience. The explorers made several important discoveries. They found new lands north of Freedom Island where Nansen landed in 1895. In March 1899 disaster overtook the explorers. Mr. Wellman severely injured his leg and will be lame for life. An "icequake" engulfed nearly all the dogs and a quantity of provisions, besides destroying several sledges. The discouraging conditions compelled a retreat, which was accomplished only after great difficulty. The wounded explorer was dragged on a hand sledge nearly 200 miles to his vessel.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

MANY READERS have sent us letters explaining that they did not cut out the blank form for the signatures to the Mammoth Memorial to the Czar, as to do so would have mutilated the fine double-page engraving. Let them now redeem the time lost by procuring the signatures of all their friends—not omitting their own signatures as well—upon sheets of white paper eight inches in width, and forward these to us as soon as possible. The Memorial is making excellent progress, but we are very desirous that every friend of the World's Peace should be represented on this massive roll, which will stand as a historic protest against war and its brutalities.

J. G. H., Buckhannon, W. Va. How many brothers and sisters had [illegible]?

Three; Joseph and Hannah, her step brother and sister, and her own sister, Susie.

From Post Chaplain Orville J. Nave, U.S.A., comes this letter:

FORT MCPHERSON, GA.

I desire to renew my request to your readers for copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (late numbers) and magazines for the use of troops in Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippines. When individuals or societies can send quantities, it is cheapest to send by freight (fast freight is best), charges prepaid. I have no funds to recover boxes on which there are charges for freight. Literature gotten to me at this point I will forward to troops where most needed. I am applied to from the islands by officers and men for papers, magazines and books.

ORVILLE J. NAVE.

There are, doubtless, many of our readers who will take pleasure in aiding Chaplain Nave's self-sacrificing effort to supply good religious literature for the "boys in blue."

Reader. 1. Will you please state the difference between a Union and a denominational Sunday School? 2. Do Union Sunday Schools ever use denominational literature?

1. A Union Sunday School is one in which all denominations unite, on a common basis, and work in harmony with each other on Gospel lines; a denominational Sunday School is one which adheres strictly to the creed and forms of a particular denomination. 2. They may do so occasionally, but the better way is to procure a supply of suitable literature from the American Sunday School Union.

C[illegible] — K[illegible], [illegible]; his wife, having in her misconduct Scriptural reasons for doing so, proposes marriage to a Christian girl, would she be doing right to accept him? Does not Mark 10: 11 brand her as an adulteress if she does?

Mark's report of what Christ said is obviously incomplete. Matthew gives a fuller report (5: 32 and 19: 9). You will see there that Christ recognized such misconduct as you describe as sufficient ground for dissolving the marriage. The man so sinned against is justified in putting away his wife and after he has obtained a legal divorce, is entitled to contract another marriage. In our opinion, a girl marrying him would not break any command of God in doing so.

Mrs. Ann Sykes (aged 74), of Williamstown, Vt., writes that she is the owner of a Bible printed in London by Benham Norton and [illegible]: 28.

C. M. McD., Monroe, Wis. Why is the eleventh verse of the eighteenth chapter of Matthew omitted in the Revised Version?

The revisers found that the most ancient copies of the New Testament accessible to them, did not contain the verse, though they did contain it in Luke 19: 10. Some very old editions have it in Matthew, but not the oldest. The theory about that and other passages which the Revised Version omits, is that some diligent student of the Gospel made a note in the margin of his copy, in this case merely a memorandum of the passage in Luke, which was appropriate in that part of Matthew's Gospel. The next man to copy it incorporated the note in the text, and so it became a part of the Gospel. This might easily occur when all copies were made by hand.

E. C., Erie, Pa. To whom did our Lord refer in John 10: 8? Surely he did not intend to stigmatize Moses, David and the prophets who came before him, as thieves and robbers

The passage is one of the most difficult in the New Testament. The best explanation we have seen is that which makes the word "before" a matter not of time but of precedence. The words were spoken in Jerusalem, where Christ's right to teach was challenged. It would therefore be appropriate that he should there declare his supremacy and say that all who came, or come, before him in the sense of claiming superiority over him, were robbers because they would rob him of his rightful position.

C. S. C., Wichita, Kan. What is being done to promote [illegible] of the Sultan?

The movement to which you refer has for its object the purchase or lease of the country from the Sultan. As he is notoriously short of money, it is thought that he might favorably consider a proposal which would bring him so large a sum as the Jews would be willing to pay. The project as yet is in its infancy, and we think a comparatively small proportion of the Jews support it.

T. L. J., Pitcairn, Pa. Does not the tense used by Paul in describing the struggle between the two natures (Rom. 7: 14-20) indicate a present rather than a past experience?

No. It is Paul's dramatic form of expression. Unhappily, it is a present experience with many Christians who have not followed Paul's example in applying the remedy he proceeds to describe in the following chapter. The power of the indwelling Christ delivers a man from the painful conflict.

This, from Mrs. E. A. V., a reader in Bennington, Vt., will find many echoes of approval:

[illegible] soldiers' and sailors' orphans and widows would be than some great monument that is only for show.

Minnie F. J., Elm Grove, Ky. What became of [illegible]?

After [illegible] to live, and Napoleon also gave her an additional home near Paris. She had an income, Miss Tarbell states, of $600,000 a year. She lived for five years after the separation, dying [illegible].

Chas. G. H., North Edgecomb, Me. 1. What real difference is there between the words or terms [illegible] all right on other matters?

1. One may be both orthodox and evangelical, for although there is a difference in the meaning of the terms, they are not incompatible. "Evangelical" is that which relates to or is characteristic of the Gospel alone, and is applied to teachers and disseminators of the [illegible] who deal with the wider range of religious inquiry, which may include a multitude of other subjects. A compact definition of "evangelical" might be all denominations or individuals who give special prominence to the divinity of Christ, and the doctrine of salvation by the atonement. "Orthodoxy" may be defined as adherence to a recognized standard [illegible] ever, and the orthodoxy of one age and gen- [illegible] you mention.

THE "PEACE VASE" PRESENTED TO M. CAMBON BY PRESIDENT M'KINLEY

The presentation of a beautiful "Peace Vase" or loving cup to the French Ambassador at Washington, by President McKinley, is a fitting tribute to the important services rendered by M. Cambon in the negotiation of the Treaty of Peace with Spain. Although that diplomat stood as the official representative of Spain's interests in this country during the war, he was at all times a staunch and open friend to both sides, and greatly facilitated the negotiations which ended in the signing of the Treaty of Peace in Paris. The vase is the work of the best artists in precious metals, and symbolizes the Spanish-American War and the restoration of Peace. It is of solid silver, Roman in form, stands about fifteen inches high and weighs over one hundred ounces. The body of the cup is covered with a richly chased decoration of the breast armor scales of Minerva, the patroness of Wisdom and Peace. The three handles are composed of gracefully entwined olive leaves and berries, symbolizing friendship. A cartouch contains in relief the coat-of-arms of the United States, France and Spain. The inscription on the neck of the cup reads: "Presented by the President of the United States to His Excellency, H. Jules Cambon, Ambassador of France, in token of his friendly services in the negotiation of the Protocol of Peace between the United States and Spain. August 12, 1899."

The Red Letter New Testament is ready for delivery. The international copyright requirements render it necessary, however, to defer sending them out until September 18th, the date set for simultaneous publication in London and New York. All orders received up to date will be filled on that day.

O. Orton, Norwich, Conn. 1. Was the affliction [illegible] put it another way: if a person lives in grievous sin, must we conclude that he was never [illegible]?

1. Both insanity and epilepsy present many points of resemblance to the Demoniacs; but in the transference to the swine (Matt. 8: 28-32) and in other cases, there were phenomena to [illegible] terpart. It has been suggested, with some plausibility, that in Christ's days and in apostolic days, the enemy of souls attempted to oppose the truth by himself becoming incar- [illegible]. We [illegible] affliction to form a positive opinion. 2. Unhappily, it is true that the good man is liable to fall into sin. He should not draw as an inference from his fall that he has not been born again, but, like Peter, should repent and seek restoration. The way of return is provided [illegible].

C. H. F., Rienzi, Miss. 1. What is the offence re- [illegible]

1. The word offe[illegible] is literally traps, meaning temptations. [illegible] must needs come. The Christian meets them continually. But woe to the man who sets the trap, who brings the temptation. There is punishment in store for him. 2. The mammon is undoubtedly money. The meaning of the passage is rather, to make friends with it or by means of it. That is, to use it to relieve suffering, especially that of God's people. They will receive their benefactor into everlasting habitations; that is, will welcome him to heaven, gratefully remembering the good done for them in this life. The same lesson is taught in Matt. 25: 34-41, except that in the latter case Christ appears as the rewarder.

W. E. B., Winnipeg, Man. 1. Why did Christ invite Thomas to touch him after his resurrection and yet forbid Mary to do so? 2. Did Thomas accept the invitation and really thrust his hand into his side? 3. When and by whose authority did Christians begin to reckon the years from the date of Christ's birth?

1. The invitation was given for the definite purpose of convincing Thomas, who had himself declared that no other test would satisfy him. He was a good man who, doubtless, longed to believe but thought the resurrection incredible. Christ would convince him, and it is well for us that Thomas was so incredulous or people in these days might still be doubting even while they believed the Bible. When so incredulous a man was convinced, we may believe. Mary's action was probably in the nature of an embrace, and Christ wished her to understand that the old familiar relations were no longer possible. 2. We do not know. Probably not. 3. Fifty Years a Pastor

Rev. J. G. Williamson's Long and Faithful Service in Bethlehem Church, New Jersey

THE FIRST BETHLEHEM CHURCH

A SHORT time ago a notable celebration took place in the quaint old Bethlehem Presbyterian Church, of Hunterdon County, N. J. It was the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. J. G. Williamson, and a great gathering of his parishioners and their friends, of pastors of various denominations and even of strangers residing at a distance, assembled in the old church to honor the occasion.

Pastor Williamson, who bears the burden of his years remarkably well, received the warmest congratulations. Several anniversary addresses were delivered by the visiting preachers, and in every way the occasion was a notable one.

In reviewing the history of his long pastorate, Rev. Mr. Williamson relates a most interesting experience. He began his ministry in Bethlehem Church in 1849, at a time when railroad and other communications were still undeveloped. His congregation extended five miles in every direction from his church. His salary was $500, with a prospective increase if the pew-rents warranted it. There were only two elders—Benjamin Fritts and Jacob S. Johnson—both very aged men. The first year he visited every member of his congregation on foot, both on mountain and in valley. That year saw sixty conversions and a substantial increase of membership.

And so it went year after year, the pastor, like a faithful shepherd, living on terms of closest spiritual intimacy with his flock, and being regarded by them all as a safe counselor in nearly all the affairs of life. Every year witnessed the inbringing of more souls to the kingdom. Eighty-one per cent. of all the additions to the church were by profession of faith, of whom three-fourths were brought in during seasons of special awakening. Many came to these revivals from long distances—some from Raritan village, fifteen miles off, and others from High Bridge, Annandale, Glen Gardner, and other villages. New churches arose as the result in many instances of the efforts of little bands of converts who had found Christ during the awakenings at Bethlehem Church.

As might be expected, the tie between pastor and people became a very strong one. Mr. Williamson regarded his flock as his spiritual children, and not a day passed in which he did not remember them at the mercy-seat. For forty years his labors were not interrupted, even for a single Sabbath. Now, at the close of half a century of pastoral duty, he has grown dearer to them than ever, and the great gathering in his honor on August 23, was a fitting tribute to one who has been so faithful to his trust.

Bethlehem Church has an enviable record of long pastorates. Rev. John Hannah was installed as pastor in 1761, and died in harness in 1804, having served forty years. Rev. H. W. Hunt entered upon his duties in 1802, and served until 1842—another term of just forty years. None of Bethlehem's pastors, however, have served so long or been so greatly beloved as the aged servant of Christ whose labors have lately been so signally honored by his people.

The New Niagara Bridge

THERE is but one suspension bridge spanning the Niagara gorge now, and this was opened to travel on July 21st last. Years ago, the gorge was nearly as famous for its suspension bridges as it is for its cataract.

About 1850, the New York village of Lewiston and the Canadian village of Queenston had bright prospects. Travel was plunging westward in a constant stream, and Lewiston was a business competitor of Buffalo. It was then that capital was invested in the construction of a suspension bridge to span the river. It was completed and opened March 20th, 1851. For years it afforded all necessary service in crossing the stream, but it was not a profitable investment. Early in 1864 an immense ice-field formed in Lake Erie, and when wind and warm weather broke it up, it was swept into the entrance of the Niagara River and on toward the Falls in great masses. The men in charge of the suspension bridge at Lewiston, fearing the ice would damage the guys, took them from their anchorages and pulled them up the cliff out of harm's way. The ice-floe passed down the river and out into Lake Ontario. A few days passed, and then a fierce wind storm swept down the canyon. It caught the bridge full on the side. Soon it was swinging at the mercy of the gale. The men in charge had forgotten to refasten the guys. When they had unfastened them and the ice had passed, they, like many others, gave no thought of the future, and now that future was upon them. Back and forth the structure swung; up and down it heaved, but they were helpless. A great piece of the superstructure broke away and fell into the river. When the wind went down the bridge was a wreck. It was never rebuilt, but for years the cables hung across the mighty river, and piece by piece the woodwork of the bridge gave way.

When new life was given to the locality by the electrical development, other men recognized the advisability of building a new bridge to form a link in a belt-line trolley service about the beautiful gorge. The old cables were cut away, and allowed to drop into the river; the old towers were razed, and only the old inscription stones saved to become part of the new work. The new bridge has a cable span of 1,040 feet. It is built of steel, and the width of the floor is twenty-five feet. Through its centre runs a single track for the electric car service. The height of the structure above the river is sixty-five feet, and here is found a notable departure from the old Niagara suspension bridges so well known to travelers. Those bridges were erected even with the cliff tops, while this new bridge hangs suspended midway between the water's edge and the top of the high bank, the identical site of the bridge of fifty years ago. The towers of the new bridge are not so high as those of the bridges that formerly stood closer to the falls. The bridge is supported on four cables, each composed of fourteen two one-quarter inch wire ropes, which once formed a part of the old upper suspension bridge near the American Fall. When this suspension bridge was taken down to make way for the new arch, the wire ropes of the cables were saved to form a part of the Lewiston bridge. The weight of the steel used in the bridge is 800 tons, and the cables weigh 200 tons more. It is a graceful structure, and will attract and delight many visitors to Niagara.

The bridge is the property of the International Traction Company, of which Hon. W. Caryl Ely is president. On the occasion of the opening in July, there was a notable assemblage of prominent guests, Mr. Ely presiding. In opening his remarks he said: "We are met here to-day under two flags, and in the providence of God, they are the emblems of all that makes for the good of mankind."

Hon. G. W. Ross, Minister of Education of Ontario, in the course of his remarks said: "Thank God, the time has passed when Americans and Canadians met at this very spot in hostile array and these same hillsides reverberated with musketry and cannon. The chasm is now crossed—the chasm of bitter feeling as well as the cleft nature furrowed out. Let us hope that it is for all time."

Never on the Niagara border has there been another such gathering of prominent men of both countries, and never was there made so manifest that true Christian spirit now prevailing between the two great English-speaking nations.

Charity Was His Sunshine

John H. Keyser Helped Thousands of the Destitute Poor—End of a Noble Life

THE LATE JOHN H. KEYSER

ECCENTRICITY and philanthropy were strangely blended in the life of John H. Keyser, the venerable New York business man, who died August 20th last, at his home in Connecticut. His career was a stormy one in a business sense, but through the clouds there burst the sunshine of good deeds, brightening his own life and cheering many thousands of his fellowmen. Born in Westport eighty-one years ago, he came to New York while still a youth and engaged in the business of manufacturing stoves. He rapidly accumulated a fortune, his factory being one of the largest in Greenpoint, and his warehouse in New York one of the busiest. A fellow octogenarian, who knew him well, informs the writer that Mr. Keyser was noted for his extraordinary generosity, even half a century ago. He gave away in charity a large part of his income. The most interesting charity of Mr. Keyser was an institution of his own creation. In 1868 he built, at a cost of $25,000, a place at No. 510 Pearl Street, which he called "The Strangers' Rest," a place of lodging and refreshment for those who found themselves stranded in the great city without money or friends. It was a unique work, but here, as in other things, the donor's generosity was often imposed upon. All were welcome, friendless men, women and boys, and Mr. Keyser paid the bills for their baths, their food and their lodgings. During the five years of its operation over 40,000 persons were sheltered, and over $60,000 expended in the work. Two years after the opening of the Rest, Mr. Keyser bought and rebuilt the property at the corner of Tenth Street and Avenue D, New York, at an expense of $80,000, and opened "The Strangers' Hospital." For three years he maintained this work, employing a staff of physicians and trained nurses and attendants, but was obliged to suspend both institutions in the year 1873, when business reverses came. Disaster did not cure him of his habit of giving. Right in the midst of the prevailing distress, finding that he had more than he needed for his own living, he fed the hungry by serving them two meals a day in the backyard of his New York home. Over 1,000 persons a day were thus assisted for many weeks in succession. In 1888, when industrial conditions were again bad, he opened a free eating-house in Washington square, and with the assistance of friends served an average of 1,800 persons a day with two meals each. The winter of 1894 being particularly severe, he aided in sheltering 1,200 men nightly, and in feeding hundreds of poor families at their own quarters. He was known, through his practical charity, to all the organized workers in the cause of humanity.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

. . . Music in Worship . . .

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Neh. 7: 67. . . . . And they had two hundred forty and five singing men and singing women

THE best music has been rendered under trouble. The first duet that I know anything of was given by Paul and Silas when they sang praises to God and the prisoners heard them. The Scotch Covenanters, hounded by the dogs of persecution, sang the Psalms of David with more spirit than they have ever since been rendered. The captives in the text had music left in them, and I declare that if they could find, amid all their trials, two hundred and forty and five singing men and singing women, then in this day of Gospel sunlight and free from all persecution, there ought to be a great multitude of men and women willing to sing the praises of God. All our churches need arousal on this subject. Those who can sing must throw their souls into the exercise, and those who cannot sing must learn how, and it shall be heart to heart, voice to voice, hymn to hymn, anthem to anthem, and the music shall swell jubilant with thanksgiving and tremulous with pardon.

Have you ever noticed the construction of the human throat as indicative of what God means us to do with it? In only an ordinary throat and lungs there are fourteen direct muscles and thirty indirect muscles that can produce a very great variety of sounds. What does that mean? It means that you should sing! Do you suppose that God, who gives us such a musical instrument as that, intends us to keep it shut? Suppose some great tyrant should get possession of the musical instruments of the world, and should lock up the organ of Westminster Abbey, and the organ of Lucerne, and the organ at Haarlem, and the organ at Freiburg, and all the other great musical instruments of the world—you would call such a man as that a monster; and yet you are more wicked if, with the human voice, a musical instrument of more wonderful adaptation than all the musical instruments that man ever created, you shut it against the praise of God.

> "Let those refuse to sing
> Who never knew our God,
> But children of the Heavenly King
> Should speak their joys abroad."

Music seems to have been born in the soul of the natural world. The omnipotent voice with which God commanded the world into being seems to linger yet with its majesty and sweetness, and you hear it in the grainfield, in the swoop of the wind amid the mountain fastnesses, in the canary's warble and the thunder shock, in the brook's tinkle and the ocean's pæan. There are soft cadences in nature, and loud notes, some of which we cannot hear at all, and others that are so terrific that we cannot appreciate them. The animalculæ have their music, and the spicula of hay and the globule of water are as certainly resonant with the voice of God as the highest heavens in which the armies of the redeemed celebrate their victories. When the breath of the flower strikes the air, and the wing of the firefly cleaves it, there is sound and there is melody; and as to those utterances of nature which seem harsh and overwhelming, it is as when you stand in the midst of a great orchestra, and the sound almost rends your ear because you are too near to catch the blending of the music. So, my friends, we stand too near the desolating storm and the frightful whirlwind to catch the blending of the music; but when that music rises to where God is, and the invisible beings who float above us, then I suppose the harmony is as sweet as it is tremendous. In the judgment-day, that day of tumult and terror, there will be no dissonance to those who can appreciate the music. It will be as when sometimes a great organist, in executing some great piece, breaks down the instrument upon which he is playing the music. So, when the great march of the judgment-day is played under the hand of earthquake, and storm, and conflagration, the world itself will break down with the music that is played on it. The fact is, we are all deaf, or we should understand that the whole universe is but one harmony—the stars of the night only the ivory keys of a great instrument on which God's fingers play the music of the spheres.

Music seems dependent on the laws of acoustics and mathematics, and yet where these laws are not understood at all the art is practised. There are to-day five hundred musical journals in China. Two thousand years before Christ the Egyptians practised this art. Pythagoras learned it. Lasus, of Hermione, wrote essays on it. Plato and Aristotle introduced it into their schools; but I have not much interest in that. My chief interest is in the music of the Bible.

The Bible, like a great harp with innumerable strings, swept by the fingers of inspiration, trembles with it. So far back as the fourth chapter of Genesis you find the first organist and harper—Jubal. So far back as the thirty-first chapter of Genesis you find the first choir. All up and down the Bible you find sacred music—at weddings, at inaugurations, at the treading of the wine-press. The Hebrews understood how to make musical signs above the musical text. When the Jews came from their distant homes to the great festivals at Jerusalem, they brought harp, and timbrel, and trumpet, and poured along the great Judæan highways a river of harmony, until in and around the temple the wealth of a nation's song and gladness had accumulated. In our day we have a division of labor in music, and we have one man to make the hymn, another man to make the tune, another man to play it on the piano, and another man to sing it. Not so in Bible times. Miriam, the sister of Moses, after the passage of the Red Sea, composed a doxology, set it to music, clapped it on a cymbal, and at the same time sang it. David, the psalmist, was at the same time poet, musical composer, harpist and singer, and the majority of his rhythm goes vibrating through all the ages.

There were in Bible-times stringed instruments—a harp of three strings played by fret and bow; a harp of ten strings, responding only to the fingers of the performer. Then there was the crooked trumpet, fashioned out of the horn of the ox or the ram. Then there were the sistrum and the cymbals, clapped in the dance or beaten in the march. There were four thousand Levites, the best men of the country, whose only business it was to look after the music of the temple. These four thousand Levites were divided into two classes, and officiated on different days. Can you imagine the harmony when these white-robed Levites, before the symbols of God's presence, and by the smoking altars, and the candlesticks that sprang upward and branched out like trees of gold, and under the wings of the cherubim, chanted the one hundred and thirty-sixth Psalm of David? Do you know how it was done? One part of that great choir stood up and chanted, "Oh! give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good!" Then the other part of the choir, standing in some other part of the temple, would come in with the response: "For his mercy endureth forever." Then the first part would take up the song again and say: "Unto him who only doeth great wonders." The other part of the choir would come in with overwhelming response, "For his mercy endureth forever," until in the latter part of the song, the music floating backward and forward, harmony grappling with harmony, every trumpet sounding, every bosom heaving, one part of this great white-robed choir would lift the anthem, "Oh! give thanks unto the God of heaven," and the other part of the Levite choir would come in with the response "For his mercy endureth forever."

But I am glad to know that all through the ages there has been great attention paid to sacred music. Ambrosius, Augustine, Gregory the Great, Charlemagne, gave it their mighty influence, and in our day, the best musical genius is throwing itself on the altars of God. Handel, and Mozart, and Bach, and Durante, and Wolf, and scores of other men and women have given the best part of their genius to church music. A truth in words is not half so mighty as a truth in song. Luther's sermons have been forgotten, but the "Judgment Hymn" he composed is resounding yet all through Christendom.

I congratulate the world and the church on the advancement made in this art—the Edinburgh societies for the improvement of music, the Swiss singing societies, the Exeter Hall concerts, the triennial musical convocation at Dusseldorf, Germany, and Birmingham, England, the conservatories of music at Munich and Leipsic, the Handel and Haydn and Harmonic and Mozart societies of this country, the academies of music in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Charleston, New Orleans, Chicago, and every city which has any enterprise.

Now, my friends, how are we to decide what is appropriate, especially for church music? There may be a great many differences of opinion. In some of the churches they prefer a trained choir; in others, the old-style precentor. In some places they prefer the melodeon, the harp, the cornet, the organ; in other places they think these things are the invention of the devil. Some would have a musical instrument played so loud you cannot stand it, and others would have it played so soft you cannot hear it. Some think a musical instrument ought to be played only in the interstices of worship, and then with indescribable softness; while others are not satisfied unless there be startling contrasts and staccato passages that make the audience jump, with great eyes and hair on end, as from a vision of the Witch of Endor. But, while there may be great varieties of opinion in regard to music, it seems to me that the general spirit of the Word of God indicates what ought to be the great characteristics of church music.

And I remark, in the first place, a prominent characteristic ought to be adaptiveness to devotion. Music that may be appropriate for a concert-hall, or the opera-house, or the drawing-room, may be inappropriate in church. Glees, madrigals, ballads, may be as innocent as psalms in their places. But church music has only one design, and that is devotion, and that which comes with the toss, the swing, and the display of an opera-house, is a hindrance to the worship. From such performances we go away saying, "What splendid execution! Did you ever hear such a soprano? Which of those solos did you like the better?" When, if we had been rightly wrought upon, we would have gone away saying, "Oh! how my soul was lifted up in the presence of God while they were singing that first hymn! I never had such rapturous views of Jesus Christ as my Saviour, as when they were singing that last doxology."

My friends, there is an everlasting distinction between music as an art and music as a help to devotion. Though a Schumann composed it, though a Mozart played it, though a Sontag sang it, away with it if it does not make the heart better and honor Christ. Why should we rob the programmes of worldly gaiety when we have so many appropriate songs and tunes composed in our own day, as well as that magnificent inheritance of Church psalmody which has come down fragrant with the devotions of other generations—tunes no more worn out than they were when our great-grandfathers climbed up on them from the church pew to glory? Dear old souls, how they used to sing! When they were cheerful our grandfathers and grandmothers used to sing "Old Hundred." When they were very meditative, then the hoarded meeting-house rang with "South Street" and "St. Edmund's." Were they struck through with great tenderness, they sang "Woodstock." Were they wrapped in visions of the glory of the church, they sang "Zion." Were they overborne with the love and glory of Christ, they sang "Ariel." And in those days there were certain tunes married to certain hymns, and they have lived in peace a great while, these two old people, and we have no right to divorce them. "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder." Born as we have been amid this great wealth of Church music, augmented by the compositions of artists in our own day, we ought not to be tempted out of the sphere of Christian harmony and try to seek unconsecrated sounds. It is absurd for a millionaire to steal.

I remark also that correctness ought to be a characteristic of Church music. While we all ought to take part in this service, with perhaps a few exceptions, we ought at the same time to cultivate ourselves in this sacred art. God loves harmony, and we ought to love it. There is no devotion in a howl or a yelp. In this day, when there are so many opportunities of high culture in this sacred art, I declare that those parents are guilty of neglect who let their sons and daughters grow up knowing nothing about music. In some of the European cathedrals the choir assemble every morning and every afternoon of every day the whole year to perfect themselves in this art, and shall we begrudge the half-hour we spend Friday nights in the rehearsal of sacred song for the Sabbath?

Another characteristic must be spirit and life. Music ought to rush from the audience like the water from a rock—clear, bright, sparkling. If all the other part of the church service is dull, do not have the music dull. With so many thrilling things to sing about, away with all drawling and stupidity. There is nothing that makes me so nervous as to sit in a pulpit and look off on an audience with their eyes three-fourths closed, and their lips almost shut, mumbling the praises of God. During one of my journeys I preached to an audience of two or three thousand people, and all the music they made together did not equal one skylark! People do not sleep at a coronation: do not let us sleep when we come to a Saviour's crowning.

In order to a proper discharge of this duty, let us stand up, save as age or weakness or fatigue excuse us. Seated in an easy pew we cannot do this duty half so well as when upright we throw our whole body into it. Let our song be like an acclamation of victory. You have a right to sing: do not surrender your prerogative. If in the performance of your duty, or the attempt at it, you should lose your place in the musical scale and be one C below when you ought to be one C above, or you should come in half a bar behind, we will excuse you! Still, it is better to do as Paul says, and sing "with the spirit and the understanding also."

Again: I remark Church music must be congregational. This opportunity must be brought down within the range of the whole audience. A song that the worshipers cannot sing is of no more use to them than a sermon in Choctaw. What an easy kind of church it must be where the minister does all the preaching, and the elders all the praying, and the choir all the singing! There are but very few churches where there are "two hundred and forty and five singing men and singing women." In some churches it is almost considered a disturbance if a man let out his voice to full compass, and the people get up on tiptoe and look over between the spring hats, and wonder what that man is making all that noise about. In Syracuse, N. Y., in a Presbyterian church, there was one member who came to me when I was the pastor of another church in that city, and told me his trouble—how that as he persisted in singing on the Sabbath day, a committee, made up of the session and the choir, had come to ask him if he would not just please to keep still! You have a right to sing. Jonathan Edwards used to set apart whole days for singing. Let us wake up to this duty. Let us sing alone, sing in our families, sing in our schools, sing in our churches.

I want to rouse you to a unanimity in Christian song that has never yet been exhibited. Come, now! clear your throats and get ready for this duty, or you will never hear the end of this. I never shall forget hearing a Frenchman sing the "Marseillaise" on the Champs Elysees, Paris, just before the battle of Sedan in 1870. I never saw such enthusiasm before or since. As he sang that national air, oh! how the Frenchmen shouted! Have you ever in an English assemblage heard a band play "God Save the Queen?" If you have, you know something about the enthusiasm of a national air. Now, I tell you that these songs we sing Sabbath by Sabbath are the national airs of the kingdom of heaven, and if you do not learn to sing them here, how do you ever expect to sing the song of Moses and the Lamb? I should not be surprised at all if some of the best anthems of heaven were made up of some of the best songs of earth. May God increase our reverence for Christian psalmody, and keep us from disgracing it by our indifference and frivolity.

When Cromwell's army went into battle, he stood at the head of it one day, and gave out the long-metre doxology to the tune of the "Old Hundredth," and that great host, company by company, regiment by regiment, division by division, joined in the doxology:

> Praise God from whom all blessings flow,
> Praise him, all creatures here below;
> Praise him above, ye heavenly host,
> Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

And while they sang they marched, and while they marched they fought, and while they fought they got the victory. O men and women of Jesus Christ, let us go into all our conflicts singing the praises of God, and then, instead of falling back, as we often do, from defeat to defeat, we will be marching on from victory to victory. "Gloria in Excelsis" is written over many organs. Would that by our appreciation of the goodness of God, and the mercy of Christ, and the grandeur of heaven, we could have "Gloria in Excelsis" written over all our souls. "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen!"

Sympathy in Affliction

Immediately after the disastrous fire which destroyed the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, connected with the Dominican Convent of St. Agnes, near Sparkill, N. Y., on the morning of Aug. 28, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on learning of the sad plight of hundreds of little children who had so nearly escaped death, telegraphed to the Mother Superior of the Convent, offering to take one hundred of the homeless little orphans into the shelter of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, at Nyack-on-the-Hudson. The Convent, by the destruction of which some four lives were lost, was situated about five miles distant from Nyack, and the transfer could easily have been made. A shelter had already been found, however, for the homeless children of the Orphan Asylum, who had been sent to a large Catholic institution at Blauvelt, immediately after the fire. The following telegram was received from the Mother Superior.

SPARKILL, N. Y., Aug. 28, 1899.
To Dr. Klopsch, CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.:
Thanking you for your kindness, we have found a home for the children
[Signed] SISTER PETER.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

ALL HELPING PORTO RICO

The Relief Fund Growing—Distributing the Food Cargoes Among the Destitute

SYMPATHY in behalf of the sufferers who have been rendered destitute by the great storm in Porto Rico, is finding expression in a steady stream of contributions to the Relief Fund. Every mail brings to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD many letters full of the tenderest pity for the unfortunates, and especially for the multitudes of helpless women and little children who are homeless and starving.

"I send this $6 with a prayer for the sufferers," writes Miss Amanda C., of Chillicothe, O. "May God add his blessing," fervently adds Miss Ella S., in forwarding her gift of $1. S. A. H. D., Fall River, Mass., sends $5, and writes: "I wish very much I could make the sum larger, but trust every little will assist, with the dear Lord's blessing, in helping and relieving the most destitute." Mrs. D. C., Blissfield, sends $25 to relieve the distress in the island "which never cost us a battle." "May the Lord encircle it by his arm of protecting care," writes E. J. D., East Palestine, O. ($5). "and bless it with a special blessing to those suffering people." "May our Father fill all the people's hearts in America with a desire to help and to do God's will," is the expressed desire of Mrs. W. H. L., Grand Rapids, Mich. ($1). Many others write in a similar kindly tone.

Additional shipments of food supplies have been made during the week, the latest to sail on such a mission of mercy being the United States auxiliary steamer Panther, and the transport McClellan. Both vessels were loaded to their utmost capacity with food, clothing and building material. The McClellan, in addition, carried a large supply of drugs and medicines, besides many miscellaneous contributions from commercial houses. As the sanitary conditions of Ponce and many other towns are such as to cause apprehensions of an epidemic, the medicines will be particularly welcome.

Gen. Davis reports that the relief work, though thus far very limited in extent, is producing excellent results and will unquestionably be the means of saving many lives. He confirms his previous estimate, placing the number of famishing natives at 100,000, fully half of whom, he adds, are homeless, besides. "Hunger," he writes, "will increase rather than diminish for many weeks." The published statement that strikes interfered with the unloading of the relief ships is unfounded. On the contrary, many laborers at San Juan insisted on helping to unload without pay, on learning that the cargo was for the sufferers. The food carried to the island by the first relief ship, the transport McPherson, has all been forwarded to distributing centres, and has been the means of reheving thousands of destitute families. The scenes at those stations, on the arrival of the relief supplies, are described as extremely touching. Mothers, gaunt and tottering with hunger and weakness, came with their children to the relief depots and wept in sheer thankfulness as they received the food, invoking blessings upon the givers.

The appeal of Mrs. Guy V. Henry, Mrs. Fred. D. Grant and Mrs. Philip C. Hanna, the founders and conductors of the Women's Aid Association of Porto Rico, which appeared in this journal, has already elicited many sympathetic responses. The noble ladies plead in behalf of the Porto Rican mothers and children, whose wretched condition at the present time can be better imagined than described. For months before the cyclone they had been actively helping the poor island mothers. Mrs. Henry summoned around her the women of San Juan and the ladies of the American colony to aid her in relieving the distress. The society then formed was the means of assisting hundreds of necessitous families, and a great deal of good was accomplished. Now that the whole island is filled with "God's poor," who have come under the harrow of a national affliction, there is more need than ever of the Women's Aid Society and its active supporters for the gigantic relief work which remains to be done. Fortunately, the three ladies named have their organization intact and ready for service. Mrs. Col. Van R. Hoff, Mrs. Major Birchman and a number of other Americans will co-operate with them as formerly.

Mrs. Gen. Henry, who heads the relief movement, is at present in this country. She is the wife of the former military Governor of Porto Rico, a matronly lady, very able and bright. She was the best aid her husband had in governing Porto Rico. Mrs. Grant is a sister of Mrs. Potter Palmer, of Chicago, and the wife of Gen. Frederick D. Grant, now in the Philippines. Her earnest co-operation in the work is assured. Mrs. Philip C. Hanna is an Iowa girl who became the bride of the consul seven years ago, and who has accompanied her husband all through his exciting war experiences. The following sums have been received during the week:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Power Through the Spirit

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 17. Zech. 4: 1-14
Golden Text, Zech. 4: 6

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

OUR chapter begins with one of a series of visions which extend from Zech 1: 7 to 6: 8, and which all took place on "the four and twentieth day of the eleventh month, in the second year of Darius;" i.e., Darius who succeeded Cyrus, King of Persia, not Darius, the Mede, who took Babylon and destroyed King Belshazzar. The prophet had seen "a man riding upon a red horse, and he stood among the myrtle trees." He is later on described as "the angel that talked with me," and "the angel of the Lord that stood among the myrtle trees." He pleads as our intercessor with Jehovah "How long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem and on the cities of Judah, against which thou hast had indignation these three score and ten years? And the Lord Jehovah answered the angel that talked with me with good words, even comfortable words" (Zech. 1: 8-13).

The prophet is admitted into this holy converse between God the Father and God the Son, and learns the heart of his God toward his people, that Jehovah is "jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion with a great jealousy." "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets" (Amos 3: 7). What must it have been for this prophet to hear by direct revelation from on high, just at this critical time, when there was such delusion among his people, that Jehovah said, "I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies; my house shall be built in it, saith the Lord: . . . and the Lord shall yet comfort Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem" (ver. 16, 17). Perhaps it was dimly that Zechariah saw this interceding One, whom he recognizes as the angel of the Lord, but that which Isaiah saw (Isa. 6: 1), and Ezekiel (Ezek. 50: 26-28) and Daniel (Dan. 10: 4-8) came to Zechariah through the ear more than the eye: he knew him as "the angel that talked with me," but in his measure he also saw the Lord.

"And the angel that talked with me came again, and waked me as a man that is wakened out of his sleep." How often some light from God breaks upon us in his Word as the Spirit of God opens it to us, and we feel like one wakened out of sleep! "And he said unto me, What seest thou? And I said, I have seen, and behold a candlestick all of gold, with its bowl upon the top of it, and its seven lamps thereon." This was after the pattern of the candlestick in the tabernacle, which God showed Moses "in the mount" (Exod. 25: 31–40); not like the ten candlesticks of Solomon's temple (II. Chron. 4: 7). The candlestick of the tabernacle was to give light within, but it was a type not only of the light which God would be to his people, but also a pledge of his will that Israel should be his candlestick to give light to the world: that in Abraham and in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed: and it shall be so yet, that God's word may be fulfilled.

But the prophet saw that which Israel as a nation had never yet seen. It was ordained that the candlestick should "burn always" (Exod. 27: 20), but, alas! Israel as a nation had not shone in the light of God, and had become like the lamps of the foolish virgins, which burned only as long as the wick lasted, having no oil to feed the light. Zechariah saw that the bowl of each branch in the candlestick before him had connected with it a pipe which should carry the supply of oil to feed the light. But where was the oil to come from? The prophet saw two olive trees by it, one on either side of the bowl, and he asked the angel: "What are these, my Lord? Then the angel that talked with me answered and said unto me, Knowest thou not what these be? And I said, No, my Lord." There is something wonderfully natural in this simple dialogue. And, oh, how it shows us the heart of our Lord, yearning over his people as he came from time to time in vision to his prophets, before he, as the Word, "became flesh and dwelt among us"!

"Then he answered and spake unto me, saying, This is the Word of the Lord unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." A lamp made to give light, but utterly powerless to give light. Not by might, not by power, not by any intrinsic, self-contained light in the lamp —not by anything which human nature can provide or produce, can we become the light of the world, "but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." How wonderful that he who in the days of his flesh declared, "The Son can do nothing of himself" . . . "I can of mine own self do nothing" (John 5: 19, 30); and owned his utter dependence upon his Father when he said: "The words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself, but the Father which dwelleth in me, he doeth the works:" how wonderful that it should be himself who thus spoke in vision to his prophet! Oh, how this truth comes out in Holy Scripture! "My grace is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness" (II. Cor. 12: 9, 10). How Paul understood it when he wrote, "When I am weak, then am I strong!" What a strength it is for us to know that we have to expect nothing from ourselves, that while we trust and obey our Lord he gives the supply which we need! The candlestick of the Jewish Church had indeed burned dimly, but now the Lord spoke of his Spirit abiding (Hag. 2: 5), and in the vision he shows his prophet the olive trees whence the supply comes. Zerubbabel had perhaps been somewhat discouraged in seeing things as they were in Jerusalem, when his people, made to cease from building "by force and power," had lost their zeal for the house of their God. O Zerubbabel, be not discouraged: hadst thou might and power, thou wouldest be helpless still: my Spirit abides with thee: look up. Gleams of New Testament light were breaking in upon this man of God.

A great mountain of difficulty lay before the prophet. "Who art thou, O great mountain," said "the angel which talked with him," "before Zerubbabel thou shall become a plain: and he shall bring forth the headstone with shoutings of grace, grace unto it." The governor of Judah should know that credit was due alone to him who is "full of grace and truth." And to confirm the word of the Angel, "the Word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, the hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house: his hands also shall finish it: and thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto you." It would seem as though the Angel of the Lord gave his own message first, and the message of his Father after.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

SOME confusion has been caused in the history of this period of Jewish life, by carelessness in copying the books of Ezra, Nehemiah, Haggai and Zechariah. Evidently, documents relating to different events have been combined as if they related to the same event, and the records have been transposed so that a later event seems to precede an earlier one. If we had the books as they were originally written, much that is now mysterious might be made plain. An illustration of this mixing of documents is seen in the lesson. Anyone can see how much more intelligible this chapter would be if the passage from the beginning of the sixth verse to the middle of the tenth were taken out and put at the end of the fourteenth verse. In the fifth verse the angel asks: "Knowest thou not what these be?" And the prophet answers: "No, my lord." Then in the tenth verse the angel tells him they are "the eyes of the Lord which run to and fro through the whole earth." The special message to Zerubbabel comes in appropriately at the end of the vision, where doubtless Zechariah placed it. His message was probably delivered fragmentarily to the people when they rested from their arduous labor on the Sabbath or on feast days. They must have rejoiced to hear from this young priest the voice of prophecy. His genius was wholly Jewish, and showed little of Babylonian influence. Like Ezekiel and Daniel, who preceded him, and John, who followed him six hundred years later, Zechariah dealt largely in symbols—horses, horns, weird figures, etc., which was the form in which the Jews loved to receive their teaching. Zechariah had eight of these Apocalyptic visions, of which our lesson is fifth in order. The first, horses and horsemen, typifying God's mercies returning to Jerusalem. The second, four horns and four smiths, meaning the great world-powers which had overcome God's people, but were to be themselves undermined and overthrown. The third, the man with the measuring line, to encourage the people with the idea of heavenly messengers helping the builders in their work. But lest the people should be depressed by the thought that national sin could never be forgiven and blotted out, there is a fourth vision, in which Joshua, the spiritual head of the people, was stripped and cleansed. The fifth vision is the seven-branched candlestick or [illegible] fed with living oil from Judah, would come light for the world. This is followed by the sixth vision, which is a flying roll, a type of the law governing the nation. The seventh vision shows evil, personified by a woman, shut up and carried away to Babylon, where she belonged. Finally the prophet sees four chariots going from Jerusalem, bearing toward the four points of the compass the judgments of God. The meaning of the eight visions would thus be that the nation would be divinely blessed, protected, helped and purified, and would be the light-bearer for the world.

Behold a candlestick. It was a lamp-stand really, as candles were probably unknown at that time. The further description of the pipes and the bowl at the top, shows that the principle was much like that applied in the lamps now in use which we call "student lamps." This seven-branched lampstand which Zechariah saw in his vision, was the symbol of perfection, as indicated by the number seven. It was in the temple, and is one of the few things in that building that we know the actual appearance of to a certainty. The accompanying picture of the fresco on the arch of Titus at Rome, shows this lampstand among the trophies which that conqueror brought away as spoil after the conquest of Jerusalem. Light is a precious thing, yet it is one of the things we can give without loss. One wild, stormy night, a family surrounded a table in a farmhouse on the mountains. They were happy and comfortable, for there was a cheerful fire and plenty of lights, contrasting with the storm and darkness outside. There was a knock at the door, and the father of the family went out of the room to open it. His wife, who was a selfish, niggardly woman, questioned him on his return: "Who was it?" The man answered, "Only a poor boy who had lost his way." His wife went on, "And I suppose you gave him something as usual?" "Yes." The woman continued, "Yes, that is like you, always giving to any tramp who comes. You will give and give until nothing is left for your wife and children. What did you give him?" The man smiled. "Only a light, my dear. His lantern had been blown out and all he wanted was to have it lighted for him. Our children will be no poorer for that, and I hope during their lives they will always be ready to do as much for any poor creature who has lost his way."

Two olive trees by it. Olive oil was used for the lamp. If the pipes which carried the oil to the lamp had been connected with a cistern of oil, there must have come a time when the lamps would go out, because however large the cistern might be, the lamps would eventually empty it. But being connected with olive trees the supply of oil could never be exhausted while the trees lived, and so the light would continue to burn. It is marvellous that the Gospel light should shine through the centuries. Our best preachers die, the religious leaders of every generation are laid in the grave, but the light of truth goes on shining from age to age. John Bunyan explains this by a vivid illustration. His pilgrim was led to a place where there was a fire burning against a wall. One and another tried to put the fire out by throwing water upon it, but the fire burned brighter and hotter. Christian was puzzled by this, until the Interpreter took him around to the other side of the wall against which the fire was burning. There he saw a man with a vessel of oil in his hand, "which he did also pour continually (but secretly) into the fire. Then said Christian, 'What means this?' The interpreter answered, 'This is Christ, who continually with the oil of his grace maintains the work begun in the heart.'"

Who hath despised the day of small things? He is unwise, whosoever he may be. Small things have the way of becoming great ones. The one hundred and twenty Christians all gathered in one room after the death of Christ were a very small company. Who would have thought then that in fifty-four generations they would have grown to four hundred millions? Few of our great movements were great at the start.

Won by the Life-Boat Mission

Many Souls Led from Sin and Darkness into Light by Zealous Chicago Workers

ALTHOUGH Chicago has not as many missions at work in proportion to its population as many other cities, it can be truthfully said that its workers make up in zeal and consecrated energy what they lack in numbers, and that the spiritual harvest is an encouraging one. Among the best known of the Gospel enterprises in the western metropolis, is the Chicago Medical Mission. Established six years ago, it has already accomplished a wonderful work, and its influence is felt over a very wide section of the State of Illinois. It is, moreover, an expanding work, being now represented in Chicago by no less than ten different institutions, viz.: The Workingmen's Home, Star of Hope Mission, the Maternity, the Children's Christian Home, Visiting Nurses' Settlement, the Dispensary, American Medical Missionary College, Medical Missionary Training School and the Sanitarium. There are affiliated institutions in twenty States and Territories.

Well-nigh every phase of religious effort among the lowly and the neglected is covered by this Mission, which seems destined to still greater growth since it has the field almost to itself. At all the branch Missions, cleanliness and Christianity go hand in hand. In the medical and rescue work the greatest good is accomplished among homeless women, although all classes are treated with equal kindness and consideration. Special attention is given in the case of converts, who are helped in many practical ways, to stand fast in their new allegiance and to lead respectable lives. An effort is made to find employment for the idle.

"We try to take care of them and guide them," explained Mrs. Sadler, the secretary of the Medical Mission, to the writer. "We believe it is of little use to expect a man or woman to stand firm in the new life, if they are to be turned loose to all evil influences immediately after conversion. They are almost certain to go back to the old ways; indeed, there would seem to be no other hope for them. They must do that or starve."

The Medical Mission is under the supervision of the International Medical Missionary and Benevolent Association, and is managed in a thoroughly business-like way. There is no lack of volunteers to carry on the work; the only need is funds, and the managers of the mission are confident that if the Lord's people were informed of the field and its need, the necessary support would be gladly furnished.

No. 436 State street, where the Life Boat Mission is situated, is in the heart of a district where Gospel work is sorely needed. Seven missions have been started in the "West Side" section of Chicago, but nearly all have been short-lived, chiefly owing to the lack of support. It is to be hoped that the present effort, which has already been productive of so much good, may meet with a better fate.

Signing the Mammoth Memorial to the Czar

Thousands of Names Pouring in—Many Letters Applauding the Czar's Peace Programme

CHRISTIANS everywhere are taking a most active interest in the Mammoth Memorial now in course of preparation, for presentation to the Czar of Russia, congratulating that ruler in the name of the Christians of the United States upon the results of the International Peace Congress lately held at the Hague. Some of our readers have succeeded in securing large lists of signatures—many sending in over 100 names. All the letters received, without exception, are enthusiastically favorable to the Memorial. A few extracts are given below:

Mr. A. P. Frick, Aransas Pass, Texas, writes:

I inclose a list of signers to the Memorial congratulating the Czar. Our little town of 109 population is practically unanimous on the Peace sentiment.

James Hazelton, Concord, N. H., writes:

I took one day to accomplish this result. I called on merchants, lawyers, ministers, clerks. You will find over one hundred names inclosed.

Mr. Jno. I McCain sends this with his list of names:

I inclose list, to be appended to the Mammoth Memorial (all of the names are those of uncles and first cousins), expressing our hearty approval of the earnest and untiring effort of His Imperial Majesty Nicholas II., Czar of Russia, in his advocacy of the International Peace Conference and its auspicious results, and appreciating your motive in doing him honor and encouraging the hope of the Christian world. May our heavenly Father direct the move.

M. L. VanOsterloo, German Valley, Ill., says:

I take great pleasure in forwarding you herewith signatures to the Mammoth Memorial, and I congratulate THE CHRISTIAN HERALD upon this great work. Every Christian ought to take great interest in the Peace Congress, and may the results be blessed.

These are examples of thousands of other letters, each of which breathes the same fervent hope for the World's Peace, and a desire for the advent of that time when "war shall be no more."

Again we urge our readers to make haste in forwarding their own signatures and those of all their friends and acquaintances who are interested in the Peace Congress, and who would work and pray that its influence may be far-reaching and permanent. Not less than a million signatures should be appended to the great Memorial which is designed to demonstrate to the Czar how Christian America regards his action in summoning the Congress and carrying it through to a successful conclusion. All the names will be attached to the Memorial, which will be beautifully engraved and inclosed in a great casket, forwarded to the Russian capital for official presentation to the Emperor.

Send in the lists of names on sheets of white paper, 8 inches wide, on top of which attach these words:

> We, the undersigned, hereby append our signatures, the same to be attached to the Mammoth Memorial to His Imperial Majesty Nicholas II., Czar of [illegible], conveying the congratulations of Christian America on the result of his action in summoning the World's Peace Congress.

Oklahoma, Ten Years After Being Opened up to White Settlement—Photographs Specially Taken for "The Christian Herald"

"MILES UPON MILES OF GOLDEN GRAIN IN SHOCKS"

"MILKING TIME"

A BIRDS' EYE VIEW OF A GREAT WHEAT FIELD

IN these days of high-pressure civilization, when a majority of the people of our great centres and our manufacturing towns are absorbed in the struggle for wealth, there are few who give a thought to the brave men and women who are pioneering in those sections of Uncle Sam's domain which can still be called new. Yet these are the men and women who, perhaps, more than many others, are adding to the real wealth and material prosperity of the country. Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will recall the story of the opening up of the reservation, now known as Oklahoma Territory, to white settlement. Ten years have passed since that event, and the land, which was then the range of cattlemen and the hunting-ground of the Indian, with no more substantial dwellings than thatched dug-outs or tepees, is now dotted with fertile farms and brightened by thousands of comfortable modern dwellings. It was in the spring of 1889 that the territory was opened up to occupation. The changes that have taken place in these ten years seem almost incredible. Our photographs on these two pages, which were taken expressly for this journal by Mr. George Stark, of St. Louis, while traveling through the Territory recently, show some of the scenes of progress now to be witnessed in almost every section of that country. Referring to the great changes that have taken place, Mr Stark writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows:

"In 1889, travelers could see nothing but an occasional railroad station building. Indian wigwams, immense herds of cattle and an endless stretch of prairie. On April 22, of that year, this body of land was opened for settlement, and an army of 'boomers' swept in and located on claims. At present the population is estimated at 350,000 inhabitants. Wheat is the leading crop in Oklahoma. Nearly every farmer has at least eighty acres in wheat. Some wheat farms are quite extensive, among them, that of Joseph Miller, near Ponca City, which, by the way, is a very busy, bustling place. He has 5,000 acres in wheat. Just imagine if he had to cut all this by hand in the old-fashioned way! Beef cattle are raised in large numbers; the nutritious grasses are abundant natural forage combine to make this industry highly remunerative to the stockman. Cotton, corn, oats, hay, vegetables, fruit, dairy products and poultry are raised in abundance also, and some of the farms are already as well improved as many in the older States further east. Some very fine young orchards may be seen, and the owners take especial pride in showing them to the Easterners." In 1894, just a little over four years after the Territory was opened, the total farm acreage had increased from 1,606,425 acres to 2,372,482; horses had increased 10,000, mules 5,000, sheep 2,000 and milch cows and other cattle 120,000. Two years after settlement, the Territory had 72 manufacturing industries. 1895 saw it with 4 lines of railroad, 57 banks, several promising coal mines, and a gold mine on the Wichita Mountains. In the same year, 77,770 children attended the public schools. Many fine school buildings have been erected and many more are now under way; within a year after the opening, the resident white population had reached nearly 100.000, and three years later it was 275,000. It is now estimated at over 333,000.

Oklahoma is already ambitious to reach the dignity of Statehood. Its present territorial administration consists of a Governor, appointed by the President, a territorial Treasurer, Auditor, Attorney-General, Superintendent of Public Instruction and minor officials. It has also a territorial legislature, consisting of a Council of thirteen members and a House of Representatives of twenty-six members. Guthrie, the capital, is a hustling and rapidly growing town, destined some day to reach the proportions of a metropolis.

Oklahoma was originally a part of the western section of the Indian Territory and the Public Land Strip known as "No Man's Land." It has an area of 39,030 square miles. "No Man's Land" was ceded by Texas to the United States in 1850. In 1879, a plan was organized by "boomers" to take forcible possession of the portion of Oklahoma not occupied by the Indians, and parties from Missouri and Texas entered the Territory, but were removed by proclamation issued by President Hayes. Next year, another expedition set out from Kansas with the same object in view, but were again forestalled by the United States government, and again in 1884 a colony of 600 men, women and children entered the Territory and founded the town of Rock Falls, but were removed the same year. Two years later, the inhabitants of "No Man's Land" organized the Territory of Cimarron, but Congress refused recognition. In 1889, the Creek Nation ceded the western half of their domain to the United States, and the Seminoles in the year following executed a release and conveyance of their treaty lands. This was followed by the official proclamation in 1889, declaring the Territory open, as already stated. In 1893, the Cherokee strip or outlet (about 9,000 square miles in extent), was ceded to the United States, and was shortly thereafter declared open for settlement.

To one accustomed to the routine of village and agricultural life in the older States, an experience in Oklahoma is a decided novelty. Enterprise and growth are everywhere apparent; new ground is being broken, woodlands cleared, dwellings erected, fields and orchards cultivated, at a rate of progress that would make conservative folks, who believe in working according to the old-time methods, stand aghast. Where to-day the woods and thick underbrush obscure the view, the next week may see a clearing with smoothly plowed fields. Our photographs afford an idea of the appearance of some of the farms—rich soil, well watered and with every advantage the cultivator could desire. All sorts of grain and small fruits grow abundantly, and the orchards are among the finest in any State. On nearly all the farms the latest improved machinery is used, and the sight presented by a vast grain field, with its great line of powerful threshing machines at work, is one to give inspiration to the beholder, who hears, amid the throb and rattle of the engines, the shouts of busy laborers and the stamping of the horses—

Religion in Oklahoma has not made the same proportionately rapid progress that has been shown in other matters, yet it has made very substantial headway. There are now several hundred church organizations, all creeds and denominations being represented. The lawless element, which is usually very pronounced in new settlements, has practically quieted down and, indeed, was never a source of very serious trouble in the new Territory. There is every promise that the coming years will witness the development of this new and agriculturally rich section of the Union into a great and populous State, and that the names of its first settlers, who have labored so zealously and so wisely for its welfare, will be honored by the coming generations who will dwell within its borders.

. . . IS THERE A TAINT ON SALOON MONEY? . . .

The Great Question of Accepting or Rejecting Saloon-Keeper's Gifts Discussed by Church Members—Some Remarkable Letters

INTEREST increases daily in the popular discussion of the burning question stated in a recent letter to THE MAIL-BAG: "Is a Christian Church justified in accepting a gift of money from a saloon-keeper, for missionary and other spiritual work?" Letters in answer to the question pour in upon us from every State in the Union, and from members of every Protestant denomination, the question having been submitted to the judgment of our readers.

Another instalment of letters is published on this page. They are presented without comment. All are outspoken, and not a few are remarkable in their terse and logical presentation of the question at issue:

Rev. Anson Cox, Scott's Mills, Ore., writes.

In the Friend's Church, at the close of last Sunday morning's service (Aug. 13) the question was put to the congregation whether money should be received from saloon-keepers for any line of church work. The response was quickly made by every individual in the house raising their right hands, that under no circumstance should money be received from saloon-keepers, brewers, distillers, or dealers in liquors, for church work.

A. Dilthey, Cortland, N. Y., writes:

If he still continues in his soul and-body-destroying-business, it could in no wise be justified in accepting it. On the other hand, should he see the need of giving up his business, and become a converted man, and should he see the need of using his money for God's glory, I would thankfully receive it.

D. H. Clark, Catlin, Ind., writes:

If the money is received without compromise, the church is justified in accepting it. Is not the saloon-keeper's money as good as the Christian pensioner's money, which is part of the revenue that comes from the same source? The offering that is pleasing to God is not acceptable because of the purity of the offering, but by the purpose and intent of the offerer. If the Church is to revolutionize and convert the world, it must use evil for good, without limit. If the money contributed by the saloon-keeper, the harlots and infidels will help keep the door of redemption open for them. I cannot see why we should not say amen and amen.

Margaret Moscrip, St. Mary's, writes:

I find in Deu. 23: 18 words declaring that certain moneys shall not be brought into the treasury of the Lord's house. This answer, I think holds good for us, as the door of the saloon is an open door to immorality.

He gave him ten commandments,
To keep him in the way.
Would God accept the gifts from him
Who doth his neighbors slay?
The curse of God lies on the man,
And he must bear the blame,
That leads his neighbor into drink,
That he his gold may gain.

O. W. Fox, Walton, N. Y., writes:

I should call it the price of blood (Matt. 27: 6). I asked the question of Rev. M. A. Parker (F. M. Church), and he said the only way he could receive such money would be as a voluntary offering, putting the same into the collection plate by the giver, and it would not do to acknowledge the gift or in any way advertise it.

J. C. Burton, Covert, Mich., writes:

If the Church accept money offered to the cause of Christ only from those who really are his by covenant life and walk, I take it nearly one-half would be refused. Saloon money is good U. S. sound money, honestly got, as the keeper is authorized to sell wine, beer, spirits, etc., by the United States; therefore he is an honest tradesman if he complies with his contract with the United States.

W. M. Moore, New Bethlehem, Pa., writes:

The inquiry could be quickly solved by asking "What would Jesus do?" In my opinion he would say, "Reject it as blood-money on which the curse of God rests."

Amos J. Spitles, Tiffin, O., writes:

I think it is right and proper for the missionary society in question to accept the money, because, first, money is an innocent agent or party, and the purpose for which it is to be applied will be none the wiser or weaker for having received it from a dealer in liquors. Second, if the society in question accepts money from said saloon-keeper, it may prove the turning-point in his life and cause him to quit his business, join the church, love it, and live a reformed Christian life hereafter.

Subscriber, Manila, O., writes:

The proper way would be to refuse the money offered for spiritual work. An offering, unless offered in the right spirit, is not accepted of the Lord. If he had the God-giving spirit he would not be a saloon-keeper. Money not accepted of the Lord would be of no benefit to spiritual work.

A. L. Lewis, Phoenix, Fla., writes:

I don't believe it would please Christ for his followers to receive gifts from a worldly man or an immoral man, for Christian work. Christ's church should be clean, if small. He loves the mite given from the good heart better than bounties given by a hypocrite.

J. J. Culbertson, Ashland, O., writes:

I answer no. Neither should money be obtained from any wicked person, not even a hypocrite. A saloon-keeper, or a Mary Magdalene are not so wicked in the sight of God as a hypocrite.

W. C. Adams, Nothingham, Ind., writes:

The money is just as pure as it was before it passed through the saloon. It has not lost any of its value.

N. Brisbin, Shatford, Ont., writes:

I answer, "No," for two reasons—1st, I do not believe that he is in any sense entitled to the dignity of contributing to church purposes. 2d. The church which accepts a gift from the saloon disarms itself of its rightful opposition to it.

S. M. Carpenter, Wells, Vt., writes:

A true Yankee always answers one question by asking another. Would it be wrong to take money that one knew was stolen and use it for a good purpose, or would it be right to take money from one that kept an evil resort, or that gotten by fraud? The saloon business is the father of the thief, the robber, the bagnio, the defrauder, the murderer, the beggar, the suicide, the insane asylum, and the alms house. Would I take blood-money, a mother's tears at seeing her baby dying for want of food, the money going to the till of the saloon-keeper and use it to save souls? No, never? Would Jesus do it? Never!

G. M. Kitson, Brimfield, Mass., writes:

To my mind the money should be accepted by any Christian organization, because it shows his willingness to lend a hand to mission work. His motives, no doubt, are pure; if not, we cannot help that.

Mrs. C. G. F., Lock Haven, Pa., writes:

I would give some texts of Scripture giving reasons why the money spoken of might be used: Job. 27: 16, 17; Prov. 28: 8; Prov. 13: 22; Ecc. 2: 26.

A. G. Bartholomew, Hitchcock, S. D., writes:

It seems to me that Christ answers the question in Matthew 10: 42 and Mark 9: 41: "Whosoever shall give a cup of cold water . . . shall in no wise lose his reward." "Whosoever," includes the whole human race. If they do good, their reward is promised, whether they be saint or sinner.

This from Beaver River, N. S., bears seven signatures.

We, the undersigned, with one voice say no, a thousand times no. Under no circumstances take the money.—J. B. Gullison, A. F. Nesbitt, F. Dexter, F. Hibbert, A. Doty, Fred. Roberts, Mrs. Roberts.

Geo. F. Fader writes:

The blood of Christ has cleansed all materials and made them fit offerings to God. Read Acts 10, Peter's vision.

G. F. Myer, Camden, Ark., writes:

I say unqualifiedly No, and I hope that at least 10,000 readers will answer no. It is a shame for us to place ourselves under obligations to our enemy. Let the Lord's people pay their debts to the Lord, and there will always be money enough without going to the devil to beg money to build a church or pay a man to preach either at home or abroad.

A Stockbridge, Bivins, Texas, writes:

I see no reason why it should not be taken from the devil's use and service and used for the service of God. God has said the silver and gold is his.

Walter McOwat, Lachute, P. Q., Can., writes:

You will find the answer to J. N. R.'s question in Matthew 27, and according to that, you had better buy a Potter's Field with that saloon-keeper's money, as it is the price of blood. It is not lawful to put it in the treasury.

Albert Burton, Roseville, O., writes:

My opinion is that it would be wrong to receive the money.

H. K., Somerset, Pa., writes:

The saloon-keeper's contribution to church work ought to be accepted, when offered as a separate gift, just as his alms are accepted in the general offering at divine services. An exception may, however, arise, as when the gift would be "meat," the "eating" of which would wound the weak consciences of brethren (1. Cor. 8: 7–13.)

S. E. Squires, High Ridge, Conn., writes:

I would accept the money of a saloon-keeper. "The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts." There is no taint on the coin. Besides, this saloon-keeper must have a generous and kind heart to lead him to do something right, and it may be the beginning of a change in his life.

John H. Pierce, Richmond, Ind., writes:

Take all the money that may be offered, and use it to best advantage. If the money has been corrupt and illy gotten by the giver, it needs to be converted to a better way, and the church certainly has the "way."

S. N. McNuett, Palatka, Fla., writes:

If every Christian or professing Christian had as much hatred towards liquor or saloons as I, they would not have to ask [illegible] of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD [illegible] saloon-keeper [illegible] Why? Because they would be [illegible] existence.

Joel E. Raymond, Ulysses, Pa., writes:

The alcohol traffic in any form is a great evil, but if the money that comes into the treasury of the Lord could be tainted by going through the wicked hands that had used it for unrighteous gain, there would be but little money raised for missions. If we get it honestly, that [illegible]

Wm. S. Settle, Lewiston, Pa., writes:

By all means let the Christian Church solicit and receive money from every source. The saloon-keeper's money loses its identity as such, at once, and becomes the Lord's money, just the same as that received from the farmer, merchant, mechanic or the Christian minister even.

Chaffee C. Treet, Savannah, Ga., writes:

The [illegible] is [illegible] opposed to the liquor traffic, which is an acknowledged evil. It could not consistently or rightfully accept money from a saloon-keeper.

W. N. Stull, Iowa City, Ia., writes:

It is upon the poor that the curse of the rum traffic falls heaviest. If the saloon-keeper then desires to make restitution for the harm he has done he must direct his most [illegible] he has most harmed. Will you deny him the aid of the church in making restitution? There can be no better use made of the money which comes from the sale of rum, than to stamp out the evils engendered by that sale, and no more worthy agent of this most worthy labor than the church.

Mrs. F. A. Osborne, West Fitchburg, writes:

I would sooner put coals of fire into the contribution box, than money from the till of a saloon-keeper.

W. W. Sloan, San Antonio, Tex., writes:

It would depend on the way in which it is offered. If the saloon-keeper should say, "I have here ten dollars, which I wish to give to the church," I say: "Take it and pray God's blessing on the donor, that by the Holy Spirit he may be led to follow his money into the service of God." But if he should say, "I have here ten dollars which I have sold whiskey for, to put into the church treasury." I would not take it. I gather this from Paul in I. Cor. 10: 27, 28.

Isaac Hart and J. J. Wilson, Lake City, Fla., writes:

No Christian church can accept the saloon man's money and be that salt that saves him in that ungodly business.

A. C. Reid, Stayner, Ont., Can., writes:

It is not right to take the money. Jesus said, "My kingdom is not of this world," and why then take the produce of Satan's kingdom to sustain Christ's kingdom. What would Jesus do?

Maude Wimer and Oganta Smith, Lost Creek, W. Va., writes:

It should decidedly be refused, on the score that it is tainted; that it has been accepted as the price of some man's soul; and that some man or men have bartered it for whiskey while their families were in want. An offering to any religious cause should be obtained from an honorable and upright source, with only honesty, industry and temperance as the underlying principle.

F. P. Campbell, Beech Grove, Tenn., writes:

You cannot accept saloon contributions for Gospel purposes with any more propriety than Christ could accept worship and praise from the devil which he positively refused to do. To steal the bread from more than orphans, which the saloon is doing daily, and to offer it to God, is an insult to every feeling.

T. Henshall, Kansas City, Kas., writes.

I do not think it proper for any church to solicit or receive money from saloon-keepers or gamblers, because 1st, Acts 15: 29. It is meats offered to idols, and blood-money. 2d, Acts 8: 20, Let their money perish with them. 3d, We can get along without their money and should use only that which God has blessed.

I. C. Wigert, Bushnell, Ill., writes:

Accept the money. You may save a soul from hell. If we took only money that was not defiled we would have but little for church purposes or missionaries.

Other letters will appear next week.

These gardens, rich in the varied display of splendid tropical plants, are among the finest in the Western Hemisphere. They are a great source of pleasure to sightseers.

Menacing the Transvaal

DIRECT menace is contained in the speech just delivered by Mr. Chamberlain on the subject of the Transvaal. He intimated that the negotiations between the British Government and the South African Republic were in a knot, which England was trying to loosen, and said that if that process did not succeed, other methods would be adopted for untying it. The significance of such a speech is all too obvious in view of the fact that men and munitions of war are being sent with all speed from England to the Cape, and that the Boers are buying cartridges by the million and are mobilizing their men. The character of the two contestants adds to the gravity of the situation. The British Government, rightly or wrongly, holds that the terms of the foundation of the Boer Republic conceded the suzerainty of Great Britain and insists that the demands it has made on the Transvaal are just and moderate. It is conscious of its power to enforce those demands and is irritated by the reluctance to concede them which the Boers have manifested. On the other side, the Boers remember that in former conflicts they were victors, and they have so isolated themselves and have so restricted their educational facilities, that they do not know the extent of the power that can be used against them. They are, besides, intensely conservative and are noted for their obstinacy. There are, therefore, all the elements in the quarrel which tend to an outbreak of a war, which would, from every point of view, be deplorable. The actual subject of dispute is the franchise. A large number of British and American people have settled in the Transvaal. Before their coming, the country was poor; the inhabitants were chiefly farmers and they found it difficult to maintain themselves by the produce of their fields and cattle. But the new settlers found gold and diamonds in the soil and they began mining and made great fortunes. The Boer Government imposed taxes on them and its treasury was speedily filled to overflowing. The settlers demanded that as they contributed so much to the wealth of the country, they should have a voice in the government. It is the same demand that our forefathers made upon England before the Revolution and was based on the principle that no people should be taxed without their own consent. But the Boers are afraid that if the settlers were once allowed to have a share in the government, they would soon change its character, and so they have steadily refused to give them the right to vote at elections. The Boers have also adopted irritating measures as to the law courts, the schools, and the tariff, which have exasperated the settlers and have caused them to appeal to England as the suzerain of the Transvaal, to obtain better treatment for them. The Boers refuse to recognize England's right to interfere, and so the question of suzerainty has again come to the front. To outsiders it appears that the Boers are pursuing a suicidal course in refusing to grant the moderate concessions which at this stage of the quarrel would satisfy England. Almost any proposal assuring fair and equitable treatment of the settlers would be acceptable, while by refusing to make any concession the Boers give England a pretext for war, which would be welcomed by the dominant party in British politics. They are certainly in the situation in which it would be wisdom to follow Christ's own suggestion which, as a Bible-reading people, must be familiar to them.

What king going to make war sitteth not down first and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand (Luke 14: 21)?

Infectious Coins

At a recent trade convention at Buffalo, N. Y., resolutions were adopted recommending the presentation of a memorial to the Washington Government in favor of the substitution of nickel for copper in the manufacture of the cent. Another reason for the change has now appeared in the report of a Chicago chemist who has made an examination of the pennies in use in that city. Dr. Gehrmann, the chemist in question, is employed by the municipal health department. In trying to trace the origin of the diseases which had been reported among children, his attention was drawn to the money they had handled. He collected from the candy-stores near the public schools a number of pennies which the children had brought to exchange for their favorite luxury. They were gathered from various parts of the city, and were taken to the health department for examination. To his surprise, Dr Gehrmann found that every coin had upon its surface one or other form of disease germs. He is now experimenting with metals, to find out whether copper carries these germs more generally than other metals. If it does attract and retain them, its use for coins cannot be too soon discontinued in favor of nickel or some other metal to which they do not adhere. We ought not to be subjected to the literal, in addition to the metaphorical, danger referred to by the Apostle in connection with our money.

Not given to filthy lucre (Titus 1: 7).

To Protect the Flag

An effort is to be made in the next session of Congress to get a law passed prohibiting the use of the flag in advertisements and in business notices. Already the State of Illinois has passed a law forbidding its citizens so to use the Stars and Stripes, and it is Mr. Foss, one of the representatives of Illinois in Congress, who will have charge of the bill there. A Chicago journal, in explaining the motive for the law, says: "It is believed that as respect for the flag increases there will be a tendency to avoid buying commodities which debase it by placing it in too close companionship with sordid and purely commercial objects. Such goods will not be boycotted in the general sense of that term, but they will be let alone by those who cannot for gain or any other reason approve demeaning an emblem which they hold above all pecuniary considerations." If such a disposition is manifested by the public, it will do more than any law to prevent the use of the flag for trade purposes. If merchants discover that the public will be prejudiced against them when they use the flag in their advertisements, it will soon disappear from such announcements. It is much to be wished that the same disposition existed about things more sacred even than the flag. Many of the worst frauds of our time have been successful through their profession of religion, which inspired the public with a confidence which they betrayed:

Through covetousness, shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you (II. Peter 2: 3).

A Dog's Logic

The story of a dog's reasoning, as told by a Boston journal, suggests a lesson which heads supposed to be wiser than are given to the canine race might well consider. It appears that a big Newfoundland went every day from his master's home to the village. As the road was generally dusty, the dog preferred to trot over the lawns by the roadside. But one of the lawns belonged to a man who kept two dogs, and they resented the Newfoundland's trespass. One morning they both attacked him together, and he returned home in a sadly bitten and bruised condition. After that fight, he steadily kept to the roadway, no matter how dusty it might be. But on one of his journeys he met one of the dogs that had punished him, and, finding him alone, proceeded to get satisfaction. He punished him severely, and returned home evidently elated by his victory. A day or two afterward he saw the other dog who had attacked him, and he gave him as sound a thrashing as he had given his ally. The next morning he unhesitatingly resumed his former route over the lawns. He had evidently reached the conclusion that, having beaten his two enemies in single combat, they would not dare to attack him together, and his reasoning was sound, for he was never molested again by his two antagonists. Perhaps if the churches of different denominations held together, instead of working separately, the enemy of souls would not be found so often trespassing on the Lord's ground. "Divide and conquer," has proved a very effective policy in the opposition to Christian work in many a community.

If one prevail against him, two shall withstand him: and a threefold cord is not quickly broken (Eccles. 4: 12).

Saved by a Song

How a boatload of wrecked passengers came to be saved in a recent wreck is told by one of the number in a Boston journal. The persons in the boat were survivors of the wrecked Stella, which was driven to destruction on the Casquet Rocks in the English Channel. They had made so hasty a departure from the wreck that they had not noticed, until too late, that there were no oars in the boat. They realized that nothing could be done and that they were utterly at the mercy of the waves. Every heart sank and there was weeping among the women. But one of them tried to cheer the others. She was a fine contralto singer, who had been accustomed to singing in oratorios. In the darkness of the night she raised her voice and sang several of the songs from the "Messiah" and "Elijah." Her companions were soothed and quieted by the melody as well as by the words. But that was not the only good result. News of the wreck had reached the land and a fast little steam tug had been sent out to pick up any swimmers who might be struggling in the water. In a pause of the engine the crew heard the voice singing, "Oh, rest in the Lord." Immediately the course was set in the direction from which the sound proceeded and before long the boat was descried on the dark waters and its passengers were taken on board. But for that woman's singing the boat might have drifted beyond rescue. The saved people might well repeat the Psalmist's declaration:

It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto thy name, O Most High (Ps. 92: 1).

THE TRANSVAAL HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT AT PRETORIA

BRIEF NOTES

The Red Letter New Testament is ready for delivery. The international copyright requirements render it necessary, however, to defer sending them out until September the 18th, the date set for simultaneous publication in London and New York. All orders received up to date will be filled on that day.

The attendance at the Keswick Convention this year exceeded four thousand persons. This is the largest of these famous conventions ever held there.

Seven Congregational churches have pledged themselves to contribute $25,000 each to the Twentieth Century Fund.

Bishop Potter has kindly permitted the Congregation of the Church of the Archangel, at present without a church home, to hold services in the crypt of the new cathedral of St. John the Divine.

A statistician reports that the demand for aigrettes for ladies' hats has been partially met from Venezuela, where the number of the birds killed for the purpose last year reached the total of a million and a half.

At the recent Zionist Conference at Basle, Switzerland, Dr. Herzl announced that the ten million dollars the society needed before taking steps to negotiate with the Sultan, had already been pledged by one hundred thousand persons. He also stated that the Emperor of Germany had promised the project his moral support.

The statistics of the Presbyterian Church in Canada show remarkable prosperity. Out of a population of little more than five millions, it has a total membership of 212,026; six synods, fifty-three Presbyteries, 1,013 ministers in active work in various departments, 108 on the retired roll, or without charge, 287 ordained missionaries, and 233 students in the theological classes.

Dr. H. M. Wharton writes us that the Industrial Home and Farm at Luray, Va., where for years needy boys and girls have been sheltered and educated, has sustained a heavy loss. The large barn connected with the institution has been burned to the ground. The fire also destroyed a number of farming implements and a large crop of hay and other produce. Dr. Wharton would be glad of contributions toward rebuilding the barn, which is a necessity to the institution. His address is Baltimore, Md.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

A Morning Call in Turkey

The Pacha's Three Wives Make a Formal Visit to a European Lady—The Result

THE life of the Moslem woman is so exclusive that one naturally entertains some curiosity as to their social manners and customs. In a recent issue of Travel, Clara Sorel Strong gives this an entertaining account of the inner life of these veiled women of the Eastern countries:

While visiting Constantinople, she had the honor of receiving a morning call from the wives of a certain Pacha, and had thereby the opportunity of observing the oriental manner of making a social visit. At the appointed hour, a lumbering coach set on springs and with silk curtains closely drawn, rolled into the court-yard. The footman lifted out a strange-looking bundle surmounted by a red fez, which, when set on its feet, proved to be a little dried-up boy of about twelve years. A much larger bundle enveloped in black silk, very broad at the foot and standing upon two feet of white stockings, next alighted from the coach. Two more similarly muffled bundles, varying only in size, were assisted from the lumbering vehicle, and made their way into the house, followed by a graceful Circassian girl, who acted as interpreter to the Turkish ladies. She wore the picturesque costume of her country, and a forehead-band of various coins surmounted her forehead and bright flowing tresses.

In about twenty minutes the guests had divested themselves of their black silk outer garments, and were ushered into the drawing-room, and introduced by the Circassian girl.

"The Pacha's principal wife: her son," she announced in French, as a short elderly woman in inharmonious Parisian garments entered the room, holding the boy by the hand.

"The Pacha's second wife" marked the entrance of a very corpulent person. She was attired in shabby French clothes and elastic side-boots, the latter worn completely out of shape. Next entered the Pacha's bride of six months, a pretty young girl wearing a pink silk robe decoiletee, a Paris bonnet with waving plumes, and a diamond tiara, which showed below her bonnet on the thick, dark hair.

The guests declined the proffered arm-chairs and rockers, and the Circassian at once found a comfortable rug by the door. She had large dark eyes and a pleasant face, a delightful contrast to the grim features of the chief wife and the oppressively ugly expression of the second. The young bride tried to attract attention to her finery by pulling on and off her pink gloves to display her rings, and by fingering a dainty, jeweled watch.

The hostess endeavored to make her guests welcome by opening a pleasant little conversation: but either through the feebleness of the interpreter's French or through misunderstanding, the talk lagged dreadfully and the Turkish ladies evinced no interest.

'What is your age?" asked one, through the interpreter; and they discussed the answer among themselves for some time before venturing another remark. The silence was broken only by the munching of the sweets and the crackling of shells filled with orange and rose water, till in rapid succession came the various questions: "Are you married?" "Are you not sorry not to be married?" "Are there parrots in England?" "Are chocolates your favorite bon-bon?" "Is London as large as Constantinople?" "Why don't you wish to be married?" To all of which the answers given were duly discussed in Turkish. They plied her with numerous questions concerning ailments and diseases, and she was greatly bored.

The party had remained for two hours, and there was little hope that they would not inflict at least another hour of torture on their hostess. She sprang to her tect and brought forth a piece of delicate embroidery on which she had spent many hours of work and pleasure, but they asked languidly, "Why don't you get some one to do it for you? You can get it done cheap."

By and by the chime of the clock announced the expiration of another hour of torture, and the guests had yet made no movement to go. While a maid brought in conserves and sherbet, the hostess left the room and soon entered with a mechanical toy bear, who danced and beat a drum, and would, she thought, possibly furnish some amusement for her guests. She set it on the floor, where it began to dance, when with one accord, the Pacha's wives screamed and rushed in terror to the doors, while the bride and the Circassian crouched together in the farthest corner of the drawing-room. The hostess endeavored to calm her guests, and quickly put the bear out of sight: but they could not be prevailed upon to remain longer. The visit was at an end.

Rosa Bonheur's Home

It is thought that Paris will buy and possibly pull down the little house in the Rue d'Assas, which Rosa Bonheur occupied many years ago. One who visited her there says: "The cottage of the Rue d'Assas, a sort of oasis in a long dull street, was arranged prettily, with flowers all around it. The first being one met on arrival was an odious little monkey, completely ignorant of the laws of politeness, and not a bit shy, who would jump on your back and at once begin to comb your hair with his perfidious little hands. At the sound of his squeaky voice and the exclamations of visitors, Rosa appeared at the door, her eyes bathed in tears of mirthful laughter. Dogs, cats, a sheep, a goat, a pet lamb, etc., rendered access to the artist's studio rather difficult." This house was once used by the artist and her friend, Mlle. Micas, "who reserved all their smiles for unlucky ones," as a home for homeless artists. A fitting tribute on the part of Paris to the great artist would be to continue its use in this way.

College Boys and Parents

Parents are accountable for more undergraduate shortcomings than they suspect, said the Dean of Harvard recently. Five minutes or two minutes with a father or mother may reveal the chief secret of a young man's failure or misconduct. "You say he gambles," says a loud, swaggering father. "Well, what of it? Gentlemen always play cards." Hereditary and home influence less palpable, but quite as pervasive and nearly as demoralizing is that of the trivially biographic mother, who, while a dozen men are waiting at the dean's office door, assures the dean that her son, now on trial for his academic life, "was a lovely baby," and who then and there recounts his whole life; or of the father who is tickled by the reminiscences of his own youth that are evoked when his son is caught stealing a poor shopkeeper's sign; or of the father who suggests that the college should employ at his expense a detective against his son; or of the father who at a crucial moment in the life of a wayward son goes to Europe for pleasure; or of the father who argues that his son's love of drink cannot be hereditary, since he himself straightened out before his son was born.

Spanish Children

Speaking of the habits of ceremonious politeness to which Spanish children are raised, literally from the cradle, Katherine Bates says:

I have seen a thirsty child of seven, heated to exhaustion with the sun and fun of an Andalusian picnic, refuse to touch the water which some good Samaritan had handed up to the dusty carriage until the glass had been offered to every one else, driver included, leaving in the sequel little enough for her. On our midnight return from the Feria, this same nina (child) of gentle memory, staggering and half crying with sleepiness, would nevertheless not precede any of her elders in entering the home door. "After you," she sobbed, with hardly voice enough to add: "And may you all rest well!" "The same to you," chorused the adults, trooping by, and her faint murmur followed: "Many thanks." "Shall I give you this fan when I go away?" I asked her once, or would you rather have it now to take to the party?" She wanted it then and there, but what she answered was: "I shall be best pleased to take it when you like best to give it."

SHEEP-SHEARING TIME ON A NEW ZEALAND FARM

Rural Gala Times

THERE are, of course, Christmas, Thanksgiving, Fourth of July, etc.; [illegible] But in addition, the farmstead has [illegible] gala times which make work and [illegible] and always fun for children.

Sheep-shearing time, the excitement of which begins with the sheep-washing several days before, is delightful all around. The sheep look so hot in their woolly coats that that the farmer folk are glad to have them relieved of such surplus apparel. After they are shorn they look so odd and naked and comical. There are always special feasts for washers and shearers, and, of course, children get their share of tid-bits.

Our illustration of sheep-shearing in New Zealand will interest readers, by showing how this branch of pastoral work is conducted in one of the greatest sheep-raising countries in the world. New Zealand's flocks number nealy a half-billion sheep, many of them fine merinos. In some sections of our own country where flocks are large and numerous, shearers are so expert that one pair of hands are sufficient to divest an animal of its woolly costume, but usually several men are required to each animal. The sheep is laid on a high bench so that the shearers may stand up at their work.

Harvesting the wheat, the potatoes, the pumpkins and the apples, "corn-shuckins" in the South and "huskin' bees" in New England, usually bring along with toil, an interchange of neighborly favors and various merry-making. Sometimes the fun is uproarious, but in the main it is innocent and wholesome.

New York's First Sidewalk

It was laid by a woman: that is, she had it laid. The woman was Widow Provoost. When her husband died, in 1820, she, then just twenty-six years old, took charge of his business—that of an importer. Mrs. Provoost's counting-house was a little out of the way, and, desiring to call attention to it, she ordered a quantity of large flat stones to be laid as a sidewalk, not only in front of her place of business, but beyond her property and up to the streets on either side of it. Country people and visitors from other towns would turn out of their way to gaze at the wonderful new invention, and the clever woman's trade was largely increased. This stone "walking side," as it was called, was the first pavement in the City of New York.

. . . A Story of Real Life Written for "The Christian Herald," . . .

By MARY C. FRANCIS

"WANT anything else today, Stanley?" The grocer carefully sifted the rice into the scales and cast a discriminating eye upon the weights. "Yes, some sugar, a couple of pounds, please."

"A LITTLE ANGEL OF TEN"

"And so you're studying law under McDonald, are you? Well, I hope you'll make as good a lawyer as he is. How'd you like some of these berries?"

Before Stanley could reply there was an uproar in the street. The grocer nimbly leaped the counter and both men ran to the door. It was the runaway of a spirited team, and women and children fled before the plunging animals. It was already evident that the horses would be headed off at the next corner, and though the lamp-post came to grief no other harm was done. Three or four minutes the two stood there and then they turned back.

"Carelessness," remarked the grocer.

"Indeed it was," replied Stanley. "I don't want any berries, but I'll take half a peck of potatoes."

"I've got some better ones in the back room." The grocer disappeared into the gloom of the rear regions, but when after a moment's interval he came into view again, Stanley Hills was already at the door and called back over his shoulder: "I forgot an engagement, Mr. Bradley. Be back after a while. Just charge everything, will you?"

"All right," was the cheerful response.

Before the sun set the next day, all Havenville was excited by the news that Stanley Hills had stolen $25 from the till of Mr. John Bradley. The discovery had been made not fifteen minutes after he had left, and in the meantime no one else had entered the store and Mr. Bradley had sat in front of the drawer reading the paper.

Every man, woman and child discussed the tale—how Mr. Bradley, forced against his will to believe it, had gone to the house of the widow Hills and offered to hush the matter up if prompt restitution were made—how Stanley had repudiated the charge with indignation and his mother with tearful protestations—how they had been offered the alternative of repayment or arrest and prosecution—of the time limit over night, and of the unaltered attitude of mother and son in the morning.

On the following evening, Stanley Hills lay in the village jail on a charge of petty larceny, and his proud and high-spirited mother sat in her little home agonized by the knowledge that unless the real criminal was discovered her boy's name would be clouded forever.

"And that is all I care for," concluded Stanley, at the end of a long interview with Harvey McDonald, who stood by him with unfaltering loyalty. "I can endure this for myself. I am innocent, and when I am out of this, I will devote the rest of my life to finding out the thief. But my mother will suffer a thousand deaths for this. Clear it up for her sake, Mr. McDonald."

"You may rest assured that I will do everything in my power, my boy. I've known Bradley for fifteen years and I think I have some influence with him. I will go to your mother now, but I want to tell you one thing more, and that is that all your true friends are standing by you. Not one of them believes it. As for the rest, you and I know this town too well not to know that there are many who toil this as a sweet morsel under their tongues. You must simply put your trust in God and ask for faith and courage."

On the following day the magistrate, who was but the tool of a faction flushed with recent victory at the polls, imposed a sentence of thirty days in jail.

When Stanley came out he was a changed youth—pale, silent, moody, missing from the innocent social life of the village where he had once been a favorite; missing from the Sunday School and the church; drawn within himself in a tense, silent life. Only two were able to penetrate the darkness that shrouded him—his mother and Mr. McDonald. The cloud that had passed over his life had cost him the position he had held in the city twenty miles away, and now, to support his mother, he worked as a farm hand, in the canning factory, in the brickyard, as a common laborer on the highways; no work was too hard or too menial for him to perform for her sake. He withdrew from his fellow-men, although the light that marked the hours of his study burned brightly far beyond midnight.

Summer glided into autumn and autumn into winter. Ere the Christmas holidays, a quickening revival wave was spreading through the church, that originated in the Sunday Schools, and there were those who knew that Hazel McDonald had in reality started it—Hazel, who loved her Sunday School with a devotion rarely found. As the season deepened it became evident that some unusual influence was at work. Children brought their parents to the Sabbath School; little tots came in, rosy and smiling from the cold wintry air, leading big brothers who had long been strangers to the sacred walls; the infant class overflowed; the pastor's Bible class became a Sunday morning forum of young, old and middle-aged men. Through it all, Hazel, although but a child of ten, remained the central figure no less by the crystalline purity and unutterable sweetness of her own personality than by the success of her labors. Scarcely a Sunday passed that some new recruit was not enrolled through her efforts, and by some strange spiritual power she seemed to acquire an ascendancy that stamped her and set her apart, and, without knowing what leadership meant, she became a leader whom many followed.

Winter lay heavy on the land when, at the midnight heart of a bitter cold night, flames burst from the home of Mr. McDonald and shot skyward, and in the confusion that ensued no one knew for a moment that Hazel was missing. Then the mother shrieked out the name of her girl, and out from the group hastily gathered there dashed a figure that ran into the house, apparently at the risk of his life; and when he reappeared he bore Hazel in his arms.

When Mr. McDonald was able to recognize the smoke-blackened face by the flickering of the flames, he saw with surprise that it was that of Jim Somers, one of the most disreputable young toughs in the village. Yet the life of his precious child was saved, and when he wrung Somers' hand it was with heartfelt gratitude. But Hazel was not content with thanks. She knew, as did every one else, of Jim Somers' life—a life of "the other half." His mother had run off with a pedlar, and his father had died in the gutter—a sot; and so Jim had been literally kicked from pillar to post, and now, after one of his periodical disappearances, had again sought his usual haunts, welcomed by no one save his own unsavory companions.

When a few days later he stood by Hazel's request in their home and was called "Mr. Somers," he started and stared in awkward astonishment. Was he indeed "Mr. Somers?" The child must mean him, for she stood looking gravely at him and repeated her question: "And you haven't really any home, Mr. Somers?"

Jim Somers shifted his position. "Well, you see, I don't live in one place all the time, and sleeping in a haymow one night and a freight car another, it's different from what I 'spose you'd call home, sleeping in one bed all the time and setting down at a table to eat every day. Of course the—the——"

Jim hesitated. "The gang" was on his tongue, but something warned him not to mention those characters to this child. He caught himself with difficulty. "That is, of course, I stop sometimes with my—friends."

Hazel went straight to another point.

"That is too bad, but don't you think it's because you don't work?"

No Faith Cure

ABOUT STUART'S DYSPEPSIA TABLETS

They Cure Stomach Trouble and Indigestion Anyway, Whether You Have Faith in Them or Not.

All physicians agree that the element of faith has a great deal to do in the cure of disease.

Firm belief and confidence in a family physician of the same confidence and faith in a patent medicine have produced remarkable cures in all ages.

This is especially true in nervous troubles, and no field offers so prolific a harvest for the quack and charlatan as the diseases arising from a weak or run down nervous system.

Nevertheless, the most common of all diseases, indigestion and stomach troubles, which in turn cause nervous diseases, heart troubles, consumption and loss of flesh, requires something besides faith to cure.

Mere faith will not digest your food for you, will not give you an appetite, will not increase your flesh and strengthen your nerves and heart, but Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will do these things, because they are composed of the elements of digestion, they contain the juices, acids and peptones necessary to the digestion and assimilation of all wholesome food.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest food if placed in a jar or bottle in water heated to 98 degrees, and they will do it much more effectively when taken into the stomach after meals, whether you have faith that they will or not.

They invigorate the stomach, make pure blood and strong nerves in the only way that nature can do it, and that is from plenty of wholesome food well digested. It is not what we eat, but what we digest that does us good.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are sold by druggists at 50 cents for full sized package.

Little book on cause and cure of stomach troubles mailed free by addressing F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich.

RHEUMATISM QUICKLY CURED.

In an article contributed to the London Lancet, a Philadelphia physician says: "Tartarlithine has given me results beyond all comparison superior to any preparation which I have tried. The promptness of its action is in many cases astonishing, a subsidence of distressing symptoms quickly following the administration of three doses of five grains each, taken four hours apart in a half pint of water on a reasonably empty stomach. The use of the preparation in the quantities named has sufficed in all cases so far treated, about twenty in number, to practically cure the disorder, temporarily at least.

Confidence in Christ

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Sept. 17. II. Tim I: 1-12

HOW much of the depression shown in Paul's second epistle to Timothy was due to his wretched circumstances and the consciousness of the near approach of death, we cannot know; but there are indications that there were other causes for the gloom evidently weighing on the apostle when he wrote the letter. Reading between the lines, we can see that he is hurt by the conduct of his friends, who have left him alone in his imprisonment. Even when brought to trial none of them stood by him. Luke was with him when he wrote, having probably arrived after the trial, but otherwise he had no friend faithful to him. But he is less concerned about this desertion than he is about the future of the churches he has founded; for if the leaders in whom he trusted desert their master in his need, how will they act toward the churches? Will they in the time of peril, which is surely coming, desert their posts? Will they in the time of heresy and general falling away from sound doctrine, which, the apostle believes, is approaching, be carried away? Paul is fearful. In Timothy himself he seems to see reasons for apprehension. Timothy is evidently timid and disposed to silence. Paul bids him stir up his gifts and be brave. All these thoughts and anxieties and fears weigh heavily on the aged prisoner, whose heart sinks as he thinks of the coming conflict in which he cannot hope to lead the forces of Christ.

Gloomy indeed was the sky, and on the horizon there were the gathering storm clouds, portending disaster. In it all there is no ray of light or hope, until Paul's eyes turn to Christ. Then the scene changes. A new note, reminding us of the apostle in his vigorous days, rings out. The body is worn out with ceaseless labor and suffering, and is aching with the heavy fetters placed upon it, and is poisoned with the noisome air of his subterranean dungeon, but the spirit is unsubdued. That is free and bold and intrepid as ever. There is no quailing there, no hesitancy, no faltering. He knows in whom he has believed, and is sure that he is able to keep. So he is not ashamed. People may say that he has made a failure of his life, that he has ruined himself, that he has trusted to a false hope. But Paul knows better. He has no doubts, no regrets. It is this confidence in a Person, rather than in abstract truth and justice, that is the strength of Christianity. Without the belief in a risen Christ, a divine Christ, Christianity could never have survived. Confidence in him and profound conviction of his power and love and constancy are the sinews of religion. The confidence that dispelled Paul's gloom and turned his wail into a pæan of victory was confidence in Christ himself. He knew whom he had believed.

A worldling must think it strange that Paul should have had this confidence. What was there to inspire it? What proof could Paul have that Christ was all he believed him to be? When men in our day are afflicted, when they lose their property, when their business ventures fail, when they are sick, when they do not get what they pray for, when some beloved child dies—in any time of trial, they are apt to cry out that God has deserted them, that he does not keep his promises, and to doubt whether he is really the loving Being that he is represented. Yet here was Paul in his dungeon, loaded with fetters, deserted by his friends, and with a violent death in store for him, and God raising no finger to save his servant, whose troubles had come upon him solely through his fidelity to his Lord; surely if any man had cause for doubt, he had. Yet he knows whom he has believed. This is the kind of faith and confidence that Christ loves to see. It is the kind that saves

Gospel Work in Colombia

Readers of this journal are already familiar with Mr. Norwood's work, and many have contributed towards the erection of a gospel tent for the use of the Mission. Dr. Samuel B. Harris, of Philadelphia, accompanies him, and will co-operate with the Mission, giving special attention to the physical needs of the people, which have hitherto been sadly neglected.

'A word to the wise is sufficient" But some people wait until "down sick" before trying to ward off or cure illness. The wise recognize in the word "Hood's" assurance of health.

"The Bethesda Home"

THROW the "Door of Hope" wide open!
Call the weary wanderers in!
Let them know there's food and shelter
Home and welcome—safe from sin.
Let them know that Christians seek them,
Not for lust or cruel greed,
But to save from utter ruin,
And to help in direst need.

Sad and lonely, worn and weary,
Carried downward by the tide,
On the waters dark and dreary,
With no compass and no guide,
Oft more sinned against than sinning,
"Magdalenes" with tearful eyes—
They have souls well worth the winning—
"He that winneth souls is wise."

Christian hearts with natures human,
Guarded safe from want and care,
Judge not harshly erring woman
Caught within the tempter's snare.
Jesus came to save the fallen;
"Inasmuch," he saith to thee,
"As ye do to these my sisters,
Ye have done it unto me."

Doors of sin are yawning widely,
Let the "Door of Hope" stand wide,
Tell them of the Christ so lowly,
Lead them to the Crucified.
God be thanked for Homes of Refuge
And an ever-open "Door;"
Loving hearts to bid them "Welcome:"
"Go in peace and sin no more!"

The Maiden Aunt and Her Beautiful Life of Sacrifice—Telling Secrets

I SOMETIMES wonder what would become of us, if there were no maiden aunts left, or if all the useful unmarried women who come to the relief of a burdened home in hours of need, who conduct asylums and sit on hospital boards, and engage in charities, were to go into business on their own account, or to take pity on bachelors and widowers and cease from their own independent estate. The lady who has a husband and children must abide in her lot, and it is a goodly one, full of honor and happiness. She who has the free foot of the spinster may go where she will, and she usually goes on errands of love and compassion, arriving on the spot in the very hour when an angel could not be more opportune.

For instance, there is Saint Barbara. Twenty years ago, when she was a beautiful blooming girl, possibly twenty-three, a young maiden whom many eyes followed with yearning admiration, her brother James lost his wife. She died suddenly, leaving a baby three days old and two little tots, respectively two and four years of age; and the callow brood, motherless, and needing every care, moved the sympathy of the whole community. James was a silent undemonstrative man, helpless in his grief, and two courses only were open to him: either to close his house and go home to his father with his little family, or to engage a housekeeper and manage as best he could with his bairns. On their mother's side there were no relatives, and James was not a man of large means who could afford to pay liberally for aid in his household. In this emergency, Barbara came forward, and offered to do for James and the children, and naturally her offer was accepted, though it occasioned some surprise, for she had been hitherto exceptionally free from care, and fond of a good time, as a merry-hearted girl should be. Barbara remained with James three years, at the end of which time he married again, and she went home, leaving the little ones grieving at the loss of aunty. The stepmother proved kind and amiable but delicate in physique, and a very poor manager, so that Aunty Barbara kept on cutting out little frocks and aprons, mending little stockings, and looking after the children's welfare, from the other house, only a half mile's distance off, until one day, seven years later, when, from the West, there came a black-edged letter, announcing the death of another sister-in-law, and brother Alfred begged her to come and look to the bringing-up of his flock of six boys and girls. Saint Barbara did not hesitate, though she did cast a tenderly regretful eye on her pretty white-robed chamber, a perfect maiden's bower, with its cool, gray matting on the floor, its home-made rugs, and spotless curtains, white frilled dressing-table, and window to the west, where the sunset glory flooded the room, and the hills she loved dearly fell asleep nightly before her lingering gaze.

"Can I be spared at home?" was her only question. The answer was immediate. Her father and mother were sturdy people, not yet feeble, though growing old; there were two younger sisters at home. Barbara could be spared. Away to South Dakota she went as fast as steam could carry her, and there she spent the next ten years, managing a great farm, presiding not only over her nephews and nieces, but over the Sunday School, the Home Missionary Society, and the Christian Endeavor; quietly, cheerily, efficiently filling a wide sphere, until one morning she awoke to the fact that she was past forty, that she needed a change, and that she was homesick for New England and the old scenes and faces.

"I'm going back to the Berkshires," she stated calmly one day when her resolution was made, and it was as if a bomb had exploded in the circle.

"Why, Auntie!"

"Why, sister!"

"What are we to do without you?"

"You will all do very well. Cicely is a perfect housekeeper and Dolly a good cook, and I have given you all ten years of my life. Now this bit of the road is done with, and I must try another path."

"But you will come back, dear aunt?" So Philip pleaded, her darling of the flock. "Go on a visit and return bye-and bye."

"We'll see, Phil, dear," said Aunt Barbara, guardedly. Something seemed pulling at her heart; she had to go, and once her mind was made up, she hurried her preparations. Soon she was once more established in her childhood's home, everybody glad to see her, many gone, more graves on the hillside, new faces in the homes, and children whom she had left at school, grown up into the flower of their youth, young men and women.

Barbara entered into everything with zest. She had received a little legacy, a thing which never comes amiss, and her circumstances, thanks to the old cousin whose quaint name she bore, were now quite easy. The young Eastern kinsfolk told her she needed new gowns and bonnets; she bought them. She revelled in visits to town, and browsed eagerly among new books in the beautiful shops. She was a radiant and beautiful woman, as fair and charming in her maturity as in her youth, and far more fascinating than she had been in her girlhood. And now, one and another began to say:

"I wouldn't wonder if Miss Barbara were to marry after all. She might pick for herself if there were a half dozen bachelors in the place."

But matrimony was not to be Saint Barbara's avocation. As I heard her dearest friend say last week, she seems born to cradle motherless babies, and bring up mettlesome lads and winsome lassies, but never to be herself a mother. Hardly was she fairly established and settled in her old lines, than an outbreak of typhoid fever carried off her sister Carrie and Carrie's husband, both in one week, and there was another houseful. This time orphans needed Aunty, and to them Aunty went, and with them Aunty is now, and with them she is likely to be for some time to come.

Blessings on Saint Barbara! If I were painting her portrait, there should be a halo around her head, and she should hold a sheaf of lilies in her gentle, generous hand.

A SECRET is a secret only while it continues in one's personal possession. Few people, unfortunately, can be altogether trusted not to reveal what is told them in confidence. They do not mean to break the seal of silence, and would be most indignant were they accused of indiscretion; but the temptation seizes them to tell to some friend, with great precautions and with pledges to forgetfulness, the incident, or the speech, the family feud, the betrothal, or whatever else it may be of which they have been made recipients. "You are not to breathe this—not to mention it to any one on earth," they repeat, but a secret once whispered in a veranda's corner in the twilight, is probably proclaimed on the housetops of the city next week. Nobody can explain it, but a secret if so much as murmured in the ear of one not closely concerned, flies on the wind like thistledown. Moral: Have no secret. Refuse to be a secret's custodian.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

H. B., Mt. Cory, O. Did Christ rise with His human nature? Was his body the same after his resurrection as before?

As the disciples found the sepulchre empty, we must conclude that it was the identical body that rose. The wounds shown to Thomas (John 20: 25-27) confirm that view. A change had, however, passed upon it, as he entered "the doors being shut;" he "vanished out of their sight," etc. It probably became such a body as the apostle describes (I. Cor 15: 44-53) as being given to believers at the last day.

E. N., Worthington, Ia. I want to go as a missionary to the heathen and I know Jesus wants me to go; but I fear my family would object. Do you think I ought to go?

If Jesus wants you to go, you ought, but we do not think you can have certain knowledge on that point. The missionary societie have already more persons ready to go out than they have the money to send. You may be sure that if Jesus wants your services, he will open up the way for you to go. In the mean time try what you can do with the heathen at home. There are plenty of them, and perhaps your duty lies with them. An indication as to that fact may be in the objection of your family. If they have claims upon you which you ought to recognize, you may accept the fact as evidence that your sphere of usefulness is in your own land.

E. W., Worcester, Mass. I notice in several ser- [illegible] that persons who are dead are now in heaven. I have never found any passage in the Bible to [illegible] into the dust when they die

Yes, the question is one that every bereaved soul is anxious about. Everyone wants to know whether the loved ones go straight to heaven or must await the resurrection when they die. The statements in the Bible are not explicit, but there is more than one that affords ground for the belief that the soul does not lie unconscious in the grave between death and the resurrection. First of all there is the promise of Christ to the penitent thief (Luke 23: 43): "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." Christ's words (Matt. 22: 31, 32): "God is not the God of the dead but of the living," appear to convey the same meaning. Again, if you turn to the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Luke 16: 22–28) you find Christ representing both of them as living and conscious while the rich man's brothers were still upon earth. Then in the account of the Transfiguration (Luke 9: 30), Moses, who certainly was dead and buried, appears and talks with Christ. There are other passages which might be quoted, but one more must suffice. Paul, speaking of his own death (Phil. 1: 22–24), says he is "in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better." Now if a man so earnest and intense as Paul, knew that after his death he would lie inactive in the grave, until the resurrection, he would not have written this. He evidently expected to go to Christ when he died, and we have the same hope.

Reader, Neuchatel, Kan. The ladies of our church started a sewing society. Lately they made a very nice quilt and to dispose of it to better advantage resolved upon issuing a hundred tickets at ten cents each and drawing it by lots. I would like to know if you consider it gambling.

All lotteries are a species of gambling. We consider that such expedients are decidedly detrimental to the spiritual growth of a church and wholly out of place as a part of church work. If gambling is reprehensible, per se, it is difficult to understand how transferring it to a church sociable can transform its character. There is no such thing as sanctified or consecrated gambling.

Inquirer, Carpentersville, Ill. Why do we observe Sunday instead of Saturday as the Sabbath when the fourth commandment specifies the seventh day as the one to be observed?

We do not observe Sunday as the Sabbath, though it pleases some people to call it by that name. The Sabbath was simply a day of rest, and in the later days of the Jewish nation, a day of intolerable burdensome restriction. You will remember how frequently Christ was assailed on the subject, and how impatient he was with the silly regulations which defined the things that might not be done on that day. When the Gentile Christians appealed to the Apostles to know whether they must keep the Jewish laws, there was a council called which decided that only three laws were binding on the Gentiles (Acts 15: 28, 29), and the Sabbath was not [illegible] of the three. But the consecration of one [illegible] in seven was so beneficial and, indeed, necessary, that the practice was voluntarily observed. Only, in order to mark it as a Christian observance, the Sunday was kept to celebrate Christ's resurrection, and it was called the Lord's Day. It was not kept as a Sabbath or rest, but as a day of religious activity. To go back to the Saturday Sabbath is a step backward into the bondage of the law from which Christ came to deliver us. The Didache or Teaching of the twelve Apostles, the most ancient document of the kind we have outside of the Bible, directs Christians to hold their assemblies on the Lord's Day.

A. B., Mt. Vernon, Mo. Can a person be really a Christian if he would not do what he thought Christ would do if he were in his place? The question is suggested by reading "In His Steps."

The Christian ought to do his duty in all times and in all circumstances. We do not know that the matter is improved by being put in the form you choose. The Christian cannot always do what Christ would do. If he were surrounded by hungry men he cannot feed them as Christ would do. If he stands beside a blind man he cannot speak the word that will open the blind eyes, as Christ would. Let the Christian obey his conscience and do what he believes to be right to the full extent of his power. When he is disposed to express an opinion on another man's religious standing and to decide whether such a person can or cannot be really a Christian, he should obey Christ's injunction to "judge not" (Matt. 7: 1), even though he knows that Christ might do it if he (Christ) were in his place.

Constant Reader, Camden, N. J., and several others. What is the sin against the Holy Ghost? Can it be committed in these days?

It is a singular coincidence that no less than ten letters asking this question came in in one day last week, and others on other days. We have replied to it already several times, but as there appears to be a new epidemic of anxiety on the subject, we repeat. As Jesus did not define the sin to which he referred, our [illegible] tain the circumstances under which the words were spoken. Jesus had just cured a man [illegible] course, attributed his double affliction to his being possessed with a devil. When Jesus cured him they accounted for the cure by saying that Jesus derived his power from Beelzebeb, the prince of devils. It was in reference to that charge that Jesus uttered the warning against the sin against the Holy [illegible] that the sin consists in ascribing to Satan the power derived from the Holy Spirit. It showed such perversity and malignity that the man who could utter the charge must be hopelessly bad. We do not believe it can be committed in our day. The nearest approach to it would be that of saying of a converted man that the change in his character was the work of the devil.

J. M., Auroraville, Wis. Where in the Bible or out [illegible] character, had no name. The word "Dives" means rich, and is as suitable a name as any for him.

F. W. H., Gambier, O. I find that by relying on the fact that "worry does no good," and by exercising will power, it is easy to keep worry [illegible]

The best recipe we know of [illegible] and "borrowing trouble" is to get [illegible] the heart. A Christ-filled life [illegible] to most of the cares that vex and [illegible] Humanly speaking, it is impossible for man to escape his burden; and no amount [illegible] or will power will enable us to remain indifferent to the heaviest cares and sorrows. THE MONUMENT TO PHILIP PHILLIPS, "THE SINGING PILGRIM."

In the cemetery at Fredonia, N. Y., a simple yet graceful monument has been erected to the memory of Philip Phillips, who was widely known as "The Singing Pilgrim." It is exclusively the gift of Mr. Ira D. Sankey and a few of his friends who, like himself, love to set forth the Gospel story in song to the multitudes. "Philip Phillips," Mr. Sankey says, "was the father of a school of Gospel singers—the pioneer in this country in a special class of evangelistic work, the leader of the mission of sacred song, being followed afterward by Bliss, Stebbins, McGranahan and myself. When I first heard his singing, it impressed me as a new revelation, and it touched a new chord in my soul. From his songs I received my first inspiration as a Gospel singer." Philip Phillips was the author of many beautiful hymns, the best known of which are: "The Home of the Soul." "Sweeping Through the Gates," and "Thy Mission." The last-named was sung by special request of President Lincoln, before the President and Cabinet. He sang to vast audiences in the United States, Great Britain, Australia and other lands, and many of his sacred songs are still used in the churches here and abroad.

Both men and women are invited to sign the Memorial—all who have the cause of the world's peace at heart. We would be pleased to have the signatures of every one of our [illegible] natures of as many friends of the peace m[illegible] gether in one continuous roll.

The President at Campmeeting

He Visits Ocean Grove and Addresses a Great Methodist Assemblage

THE annual campmeeting, just concluded at Ocean Grove, has been one of unusual interest. An event which attracted national attention and wide comment was the visit and address of President McKinley on Aug. 25. He was at Long Branch reviewing New Jersey troops, when the "soldiers of the Cross" at Ocean Grove sent him, through Dr. J. E. Price, Dean of the Summer School of Theology, an invitation to visit them, and Friday about noon the little city by the sea knew that the Chief Magistrate would be within her borders at three o'clock. There was not much time for preparation; flags went up over houses and tents; red, white and blue bunting quickly made its appearance everywhere.

ON THE FAMOUS "BOARD WALK" AT OCEAN GROVE

The great auditorium was filled to overflowing, and thousands stood outside and in the aisles. Dr. A. E. Ballard, the venerable Vice-President of the Association, opened the service. An anthem was sung; a sweet-voiced young singer (Miss Blanch Bennett, of New York City) rendered "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord;" the quartette and chorus and congregation followed with good old Gospel hymns; and then the great congregation was on its feet and a snowstorm of handkerchiefs were fluttering in the Chautauqua salute, for the President had come and was on the platform. Bishop Fitzgerald, in a few fitting words, introduced the President, saying:

"It is a joy to us, Mr. President, to know that while, as the Chief Ruler of our country, you are its chief standard-bearer, that you also delight in marching with the followers of the Lord under the banner of the Cross, and so, not only as Chief Magistrate, but as a beloved brother, we welcome you here."

In responding, the President, after paying his respects to the gathering, said:

Piety and Patriotism go well together. Love of the flag, love of the country, is not inconsistent with our religious faith, and I think we have more love for our country and more love for our flag than ever before. And wherever that flag is raised it stands not for despotism and depression, but for liberty, opportunity and humanity. And what that flag has done for us we want it should do for all peoples and all lands, which by the efforts of war have come within its jurisdiction. That flag does not mean one thing in the United States and another thing in Porto Rico. There has been doubt expressed in some quarters as to the purpose of the government respecting the Philippines. I can see no harm in stating in this presence: Peace first, then, with charity for all, establish a government of law and order, protecting life, property and occupation for the well-being of the people, in which they will participate under the Stars and Stripes.

Attendance at the camp meeting has been very large. The Auditorium, Young People's Temple, Tabernacle, Thornley Chapel and Beach services have been thronged by devout souls and earnest seekers after truth, from the opening prayer-meeting on Aug. 18th to the closing exercises on Aug. 31st. On the 20th, Bishop Dubbs preached the first Sabbath sermon to an immense concourse, and on Sunday, Aug. 27th, interest had so increased that it was impossible to accommodate many who came to hear Bishop Fowler. Among many prominent speakers who have addressed the congregations are Rev. Dr. A. E. Schell, corresponding secretary of the Epworth League; Rev. Ferdinand C. Inglehart, of Newburg; Rev. Dr. Thomas, of Philadelphia; Bishop Grant, of the African M. E. Church, and others, besides the regular leaders.

In the presence of so much that was bright, it is sad to record that there was the shadow of death; the sudden decease of Dr. Lowrie, late leader of the meetings in the Young People's Temple, was a cause of sorrow to many.

At the last Sabbath sunrise meeting, a great flag, bearing the inscription, "In the Beginning, God," was raised in the presence of 1,000 revivalists, who awoke the grove with the morning hymn. The lovefeast was attended by 10,000 people. At the Beach meeting conducted by Bishop Fitzgerald there were some 20,000 in the congregation; and a special choir of 300 voices led the singing.

A Blasphemer Silenced

A gentleman once related an incident that happened on the St. Lawrence River. Among the passengers on the boat was a loud and fluent talker who set up for an atheist. He said that religion was an exploded superstition that men had outgrown; that in another fifty years, Bibles, churches, and piety, would be things of the wornout past. "They say," he said fiercely, "that their Christianity shall become a mountain, and fill the whole earth. A stone growing. Yes, it will grow as much as any other stone," with a sneer. He looked about for the effect of his words, and met the eyes of a lady whose whole face expressed horror. He said flippantly: "Miss, I seem to have alarmed you; you look frightened."

"I am," she responded promptly, "for you. 'Whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder.'"

A profound quiet fell on the company, and during this the blasphemer slipped into his stateroom silenced and abashed at the merited rebuke.

Miner Bunt's Gospel Wagon

A Converted Cornishman Who Now Labors for Christ in a Unique Vehicle in England

AMONG the many agencies representing the force, source and growth of Methodism at the great Wesleyan Conference just held in London, none gained more attention than a modest Wesleyan preacher and his car, belonging to the Wesleyan Home Mission. It was drawn up close before the entrance to the chapel built by John Wesley, where the delegates passed it at each session. It was two years old, but had a fresh coat of paint and was in the trimmest order, and no doubt many a restless pastor wished he had its wheels under him to take him to "pastures green."

It was an object of constant interest and curious investigation. The platform where the speaker stands can be folded up or extended at will, and is reached by a short ladder which is hauled up and carried in the car. The interior is provided with a small sleeping room, library, clothes press, mirror and small coal stove. Mottoes hang around the rooms. While compact, the rooms are very attractive and comfortable, winter and summer. The car is provided with a portable organ, which is one of the essential features of this church on wheels.

The preacher in charge of the car is Nimrod Bunt. He was born in Cornwall among the mines. Eight sad years of his early life were spent in a workhouse. He was then apprenticed to a bootmaker. He was "saved by the voice of God and a mother's prayers," as he often testifies with a tremor in his deep Cornwall voice. He is a fervent and eloquent speaker. He adds: "I was saved at sixteen, and have been preaching inside and out for ten years. I have seen much of sin and many saved." He is a rugged robust man of twenty-eight, believes in the car and rejoices that God called him to the work, and has started two churches and thirty-six Sunday schools. His mornings are spent in study, afternoons in pastoral visiting and children's meeting, and in the evening he preaches, always concluding with an after-meeting, to which troubled and penitent souls are invited to remain. In the past few months a hundred hopeful conversions are recorded. He is an excellent singer, having a rich baritone voice, and his discourses are interspersed with solos and gospel songs, mostly from Moody and Sankey's collection. He usually has a man to drive the two horses and care for them, though he can do it himself. His associate is Rev. Arthur E. Clifford, an evangelist of the same earnest persuasive type. They have invitations to many villages, and when they leave one town it is to enter another. They like to draw up the gospel wagon near some Wesleyan chapel and have the hearty co-operation of the local pastor. The police will not generally allow the wagon in the street long enough for a service, and the evangelists find refuge in a park or grove. Personally, Mr. Bunt is of a retiring disposition, but believes he is in the noblest mission on earth, and would not exchange his movable pulpit for that of Westminster Abbey.

NIMROD BUNT

THE GOSPEL WAGON READY FOR A SERVICE

The Right Kind of Faith

BY D. L. MOODY

THE idea that you require a special kind of faith is all wrong. Use the faith you have already. Just believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. Any faith that brings you to him and links you with him is the right kind of faith. Suppose I meet a man whom I have seen night after night begging, and I say to him:

"Hullo, beggar, is that you?"

"Don't call me a beggar; I am no longer a beggar."

"Are you not the man who has been begging here every night?"

"Yes."

"Where did you get your good clothes? How is it you are not a beggar?"

"No, I am no beggar; I am worth a thousand dollars."

"How is that?"

"Well, sir, last night I was here begging, and a man came along and put a check for one thousand dollars in my hand."

"How did you know it was good?"

"I took it to the bank, and they gave me gold for it."

"How was it done?"

"Well, I held out my hand, and he put the check right into it, and I took it to the bank and got gold for it."

"Did you really get it in that way?"

"Yes."

"How do you know it was the right kind of hand?"

"Why," says the beggar, "what do I care about the hand? I have got the money."

Faith is the hand that reaches out and takes the blessing. Any faith that brings you to Christ is the right kind of faith, and instead of looking at your faith look to Christ. See if you have the right kind of a Christ—a Christ that is giving you victory over sin. Some one has said that faith is to the soul what the eye is to the body. I do not pick my eyes out of my head every now and then to see if they are the right kind of eyes. Yet people are doing that with faith all the time.

We are living in very strange days. Some people tell us it does not make any difference what a man believes if he is only "sincere;" one church is just as good as another if you are only sincere. I do not believe any greater delusion ever came out of the pit of hell than that.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

The Queens of Home

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Sol. Song 6: 8, . . . There are three-score queens . . .

SOLOMON, by one stroke, set forth the imperial character of a true Christian woman. She is not a slave, not a hireling, not a subordinate, but a queen. In a former sermon I showed you that crown and courtly attendants, and imperial wardrobe were not necessary to make a queen; but that graces of the heart and life will give coronation to any woman. I showed you at some length that woman's position was higher in the world than man's, and that although she had often been denied the right of suffrage, she always did vote and always would vote by her influence; and that her chief desire ought to be that she should have grace rightly to rule in the dominion which she has already won. I began an enumeration of some of her rights, and now I resume the subject.

In the first place, woman has the special and the superlative right of blessing and comforting the sick. What land, what street, what house, has not felt the smitings of disease? Tens of thousands of sick-beds! What shall we do with them? Shall man, with his rough hand and clumsy foot, go stumbling around the sick-room, trying to soothe the distracted nerves and alleviate the pains of the distressed patient? The young man at college may scoff at the idea of being under maternal influences; but at the first blast of typhoid fever on his cheek, he says, "Where is mother?" Walter Scott wrote partly in satire and partly in compliment:

> [illegible]
> Uncertain, coy and hard to please;
> When pain and anguish wring the brow,
> A ministering angel thou.

I think the most pathetic passage in all the Bible is the description of the lad who went out to the harvest field of Shunem and got sunstruck—pressing his hands on his temples and crying out: "Oh, my head! my head!" And they said: "Carry him to his mother." And then the record is: "He sat on her knees till noon, and then died."

It is an awful thing to be ill away from home in a strange hotel, once in a while men coming in to look at you, holding their hand over their mouth for fear they will catch the contagion. How roughly they turn you in bed. How loudly they talk. How you long for the ministries of home. I know one such who went away from one of the brightest of homes, for several weeks' business absence at the West. A telegram came at midnight that he was on his death-bed far away from home. By express train the wife and daughters went westward; but they went too late. He feared not to die, but he was in an agony to live until his family got there. He tried to bribe the doctor to make him live a little while longer. He said: "I am willing to die, but not alone." But the pulses fluttered, the eyes closed, and the heart stopped. The express trains met in the midnight: wife and daughters going westward—lifeless remains of husband and father coming eastward. Oh, it was a sad, pitiful, overwhelming spectacle! When we are sick, we want to be sick at home. When the time comes for us to die, we want to die at home. The room may be very humble, and the faces that look into ours may be very plain; but who cares for that? Loving hands to bathe the temples. Loving voices to speak good cheer. Loving lips to read the comforting promises of [illegible].

In our Civil War, men cast the cannon, men fashioned the musketry, men cried to the hosts, "Forward, march!" men hurled their battalions on the sharp edges of the enemy, crying, "Charge! charge!" but the angels of God will come out to watch, and the Lord Almighty will give his messenger lasts a charge saying, "Look after that woman; canopy her with your wings, and shelter her from all harm;" and while you are seated in the house of destitution and suffering, the little ones around the room will whisper, "Who is she? 'Ain't she beautiful!'" and if you will listen right sharply, you will hear dripping down through the leaky roof, and rolling over the rotten stairs, the angel chant that shook Bethlehem: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men."

Can you tell me why a Christian woman, going down among the haunts of iniquity, on a Christian errand, never meets with any indignity? I stood in the chapel of Helen Chalmers, the daughter of the celebrated Dr. Chalmers, in the most abandoned part of the city of Edinburgh, and I said to her as I looked around upon the fearful surroundings of that place, "Do you come here nights to hold a service?" "O, yes," she said. "Can it be possible that you never meet with an insult while performing this Christian errand?" "Never," she said, "never." That young woman who has her father by her side, walking down the street, armed police at each corner, is not so well defended as that Christian woman who goes forth on Gospel work into the haunts of iniquity, carrying the Bibles and bread. God, with the red right arm of his wrath omnipotent, would tear to pieces any one who should offer indignity to her. He would smite him with lightnings, and drown him with floods, and swallow him with earthquakes, and damn him with eternal indignations. Some one said: "I dislike very much to see that Christian woman teaching those bad boys in the mission school. I am afraid to have her instruct them." "So," said another man, "I am afraid, too." Said the first: "I am afraid they will use vile language before they leave the place." "Ah," said the other man, "I am not afraid of that. What I am afraid of is, that if any of those boys should use a bad word in her presence, the other boys would tear him to pieces and kill him on the spot." That woman is the best sheltered who is sheltered by the Lord God Almighty, and you need never fear going anywhere where God tells you to go.

It seems as if the Lord had ordained woman for an especial work in the solicitation of charities. Backed up by barrels in which there is no flour, and by stoves in which there is no fire, and by wardrobes in which there are no clothes, a woman is irresistible. Passing on her errand, God says to her: "You go into that bank or store or shop and get the money." She goes in and gets it. The man is hard-fisted, but she gets it. She could not help but get it. It is decreed from eternity she should get it. No need of your turning your back and pretending you don't hear; you do hear. There is no need of your saying you are begged to death. There is no need of your wasting your time, and you might as well submit first as last. You had better right away take down your check-book, mark the number of the check, fill up the blank, sign your name, and hand it to her. There is no need of wasting time. Those poor children on the back street have been hungry long enough. That sick man must have some farina. That consumptive must have something to ease his cough. I meet this delegate of a relief society coming out of the store of such a hard-fisted man, and I say: "Did you get the money?" "Of course," she says, "I got the money: that's what I went in for. The Lord told me to go in and get it, and he never sends me on a fool's errand."

Again: I have to tell you that it is a woman's specific right to comfort under the stress of dire disaster. She is called the weaker vessel; but all profane as well as sacred history attests that when the crisis comes, she is better prepared than man to meet the emergency. How often you have seen a woman who seemed to be a disciple of frivolity and indolence, who, under one stroke of calamity, changed to a heroine. Oh, what a great mistake those business men make who never tell their business troubles to their wives! There comes some great loss to their store, or some of their companions in business play them a sad trick, and they carry the burden all alone. He is asked [illegible] the household again and again, "What is the matter?" He is [illegible] within his own soul. O, if your one duty was to tell your wife all about it! She perhaps might not have increased your credit, but she would have helped you to [illegible] carry on one shoulder that which is intended for two. Business men know what I mean. There came a crisis in your affairs. You struggled bravely and long; but after a while there came a day when you said: "Here I shall have to stop;" and you called in your partners, and you called in the most prominent men in your employ, and you said: "We have got to stop." You met the case suddenly. You could hardly make up your mind to pass through the street and over on the ferry-boat. You felt everybody would be looking at you, and blaming you, and denouncing you. You hastened home. You told your wife all about the affair. What did she say? Did she play the butterfly? Did she talk about the silks and the ribbons and the fashions? No. She came up to the emergency. She quailed not under the stroke. She offered to go out of the comfortable house into a smaller one, and wear the old cloak another winter. She was the one who understood your affairs without blaming you. You looked upon what you thought was a thin, weak woman's arm holding you up: but while you looked at that arm, there came into it the muscle of [illegible] the strength of the eternal God. No chiding. No fretting. No telling you about the beautiful house of her father from which you brought her ten, twenty or thirty years ago. You said: "Well, this is the happiest day of my life. I am glad I have got from under my burden. My wife don't care—I don't care." At the moment you were exhausted. God sent a Deborah to meet the host of Amalekites and scatter them like chaff over the plain. There are sometimes women who sit reading sentimental novels, and who wish that they had some grand field in which to display their Christian powers. What grand and glorious things they could do if they only had an opportunity! My sister, you need not wait for any such time. A crisis will come in your affairs. There will be a Thermopylæ in your own household where God will tell you to stand. There are scores and hundreds of households to-day where as much bravery and courage are demanded of women as was exhibited by Grace Darling, or Marie Antoinette, or Joan of Arc.

Again: I remark it is woman's right to bring to us the kingdom of heaven. It is easier for a woman to be a Christian than for a man. Why? You say she is weaker. No. Her heart is more responsive to the pleadings of divine love. She is in vast majority. The fact that she can more easily become a Christian, I prove by the statement that three-fourths of the members of churches in all Christendom are women. So God appoints them to be the chief agencies for bringing this world back to God. I may stand here and say the soul is immortal. There is a man who will deny it. I may stand here and say we are lost and undone without Christ. There is a man who will contradict it. I may stand here and say there will be a Judgment day after a while. Yonder is some one who will dispute it. But a Christian woman in a Christian household, living in the faith and the consistency of Christ's Gospel—nobody can refute that. The greatest sermons are not preached on celebrated platforms: they are preached with an audience of two or three, and in private home life. A consistent, consecrated Christian service is an unanswerable demonstration of God's truth.

A sailor came slipping down the ratlines one night, as though something had happened, and the sailors cried: "What's the matter?" He said: "My mother's prayer haunts me like a ghost." Home influences, consecrated home influences, are the mightiest of all influences upon the soul. There are men who have maintained their integrity, not because they were any better naturally than some other people, but because there were home influences praying for them all the time. They got a good start. They were launched on the world with the benedictions of a Christian mother. They may track Siberian snows, they may plunge in African jungles, they may flee to the earth's end—they cannot go so far and so fast but the prayers will keep up with them.

I speak to women who have the eternal salvation of their husbands in their right hand. On the marriage day you took an oath before men and angels that you would be faithful and kind until death did you part, and I believe you are going to keep that oath; but after that parting at the grave, will it be an eternal separation? Is there any such thing as an immortal marriage, making the flowers that grow on the top of the sepulchre brighter than the garlands which at the marriage banquet flooded the air with aroma? Yes; I stand here as an ambassador of the most high God, to proclaim the banns of an immortal union for all those who join hands in the grace of Christ. O woman, is your husband, your father, your son, away from God? The Lord demands their redemption at your hands. There are prayers for you to offer, there are exhortations for you to give, there are examples for you to set, and I say now, as Paul said to the Corinthian woman: "What knowest thou, but thou shalt save thy husband?" A man was dying; and he said to his wife: "Rebecca, you wouldn't let me have family prayers; you laughed about all that, and you got me away into worldliness; and now I'm going to die, and my fate is sealed, and you are the cause of my ruin!" O woman, what knowest thou but thou canst destroy thy husband?

Are there not some of you who have kindly influences at home? Are there not some who have wandered far away from God, who can remember the Christian influences in their early home? Do not despise those influences, my brother. If you die without Christ, what will you do with your mother's prayers, with your wife's importunities, with your sister's entreaties? What will you do with the letters they used to write to you, with the memory of those days when they attended you so kindly in times of sickness? Oh, if there be just one strand holding you from floating off from that dark sea, I would just like to take hold of that strand now, and pull you to the beach! For the sake of your wife's God, for the sake of your mother's God, for the sake of your daughter's God, for the sake of your sister's God, come this day and be saved.

Lastly: I wish to say that one of the specific rights of woman is, through the grace of Christ, finally to reach heaven. O, what a multitude of women in heaven! Mary, Christ's mother, in heaven, Elizabeth Fry in heaven, Charlotte Elizabeth in heaven, the mother of Augustine in heaven, the Countess of Huntington—who sold her splendid jewels to build chapels—in heaven, while a great many others, who have never been heard of on earth, or known but little, have gone into the rest and peace of heaven. What a rest! What a change it was from the small room, with no fire and one window (the glass broken out), and the aching side, and worn out eyes, to the "house of many mansions!" No more stitching until twelve o'clock at night, no more thrusting of the thumb by the employer through the work, to show it was not done quite right. Plenty of bread at last! Heaven for aching heads! heaven for broken hearts! heaven for anguish-bitten frames! No more sitting until midnight for the coming of staggering steps! No more rough blows across the temples! No more sharp, keen, bitter curses!

Some of you will have no rest in this world. It will be toil and struggle and suffering all the way up. You will have to stand at your door, fighting back the wolf with your own hand, red with carnage. But God has a crown for you. I want you to realize this morning that he is now making it, and whenever you weep a tear he sets another gem in that crown; whenever you have a pang of body or soul, he puts another gem in that crown, until, after a while, in all the tiara there will be no room for another splendor, and God will say to his angel, "The crown is done; let her up, that she may wear it." And as the Lord of Righteousness puts the crown upon your brow, angel will cry to angel, "Who is she?" and Christ will say, "I will tell you who she is. She is the one that came up out of great tribulation, and had her robe washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." And then God will spread a banquet and he will invite all the principalities of heaven to sit at the feast, and the tables will blush with the best clusters from the vineyards of God and crimson with the twelve manner of fruits from the Tree of Life, and waters from the fountains of the rock will flash from the golden tankards, and the old harpers of heaven will sit there, making music with their harps, and Christ will point you out, amid the celebrities of heaven, saying, "She suffered with me on earth, now we are going to be glorified together." And the banqueters, no longer able to hold their peace, will break forth with congratulation: "Hail, hail!" And there will be handwritings on the wall—not such as struck the Babylonian noblemen with horror—but fire-tipped fingers, writing in blazing capitals of light and love, "God hath wiped away all tears from all faces!"

The Boer President as He Is

IT may be doubted if Africa has produced a more remarkable character than the man who governs in the South African Republic. The son of a peasant, the President is older than the State he rules. He was born on a farm at Rustenburg, on October 10, 1825. At seven, he killed his first game; at eleven, he shot his first lion. Before he was ten, he acted as shepherd, and led the oxen yoked in the great wagon. Before he could hold a gun, he handled a bow and arrow with such skill that practised archers were amazed. At the same age, he helped to build the first church in Rustenburg. He was as fleet of foot as he was unerring in his aim. One day he had to face a lion alone, and he stood before the beast at arm's length, with nothing but a useless rifle in his hand.

On another occasion he turned round while his horse was in full gallop and shot a buffalo, which was chasing him, dead through the forehead. Like Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Kruger mutilated his hand in his younger days. Mr. Gladstone, having injured his finger while on his Hawarden estate, held it calmly under the surgeon's knife. Mr. Kruger's left thumb was shattered by the bursting of his gun while hunting. The doctor would have cut off the arm, but Kruger, unwilling to lay his gun down for ever, refused. Neither would he allow his hand to be amputated. "Then I can do nothing for you," said the doctor, leaving him in anger. Taking out his jack-knife, Kruger sharpened it, and cut off the top of his thumb. The flesh beginning to mortify, the brave youth cut off the thumb at the second joint, and the wound healed.

The only books President Kruger has ever read are the Bible, "The Pilgrim's Progress," and the history of the Revolt of the Netherlands. He was brought up with a Bible in one hand and a gun in the other, and the training has had its natural result. He is saturated with Old Testament religion, though he knows the New Testament too, and was converted through perusing it in the woods, alone with God and his Word. He is said to have finished a speech at the opening of a synagogue with the words, "In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ I declare this building open."

"All who love Jesus Christ should love one another," Mr. Kruger said to an American not long ago, and he has declared that "the nation which fears God and obeys him is the only prosperous nation." He was christened after three Bible characters—his full name is Stephanus Johannes Paulus Kruger—and Bible texts crop up in all his speeches and in his ordinary conversation. He often preaches in the local chapels. In his home life he is a simple Boer, with no sign of his lofty position save the sentinels who guard his home, and the stone lions which stand in front of his house.

The Little Prairie Church

Now Finished and Opened Through the Generous Aid of Our Readers and Other Friends

A FEW years ago, a man, miserable and under deep conviction of sin, wandered past the Bowery Mission, attracted by the sweet singing, which called up to his recollection days long past. He remembered that his mother used to sing these sweet melodies of Jesus and his love. He wandered into the mission and there found the "one thing lacking" in his life—the Pearl of great Price, a loving, living Saviour. From that time forward, this same man—once an unsaved wanderer, now a preacher of the Gospel—has been lifting up Jesus to dying men and women. Called out West to take charge of an M. E. Church at Imperial, Neb., Rev. F. Baylis has for the past Conference year been doing, to quote the presiding elder's words, "monumental work."

REV. F. BAYLIS

On looking over his charge, in the spring, he saw that the chief need of the people in that lovely prairie town was a suitable church building. To supply this need, he set himself diligently to work. Our readers well remember the visit of the "cowboy preacher" of Nebraska to New York, in April and May of this year, and the interesting account of his work which he gave in many churches in the East. These churches gave of their means to help build a church out on the Nebraska prairie to the glory of God. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers were also interested seeing an opportunity for good, and an account of the work appeared in our issue of April 26, 1899. Many readers sent in their gifts in aid of the projected building, and in due course the money so contributed was forwarded to the Building Committee. That work of love has now borne fruit, even more quickly than was expected. On this page we present a photograph of the completed church, taken only a few days ago. Pastor Baylis writes us that the funds for furnishing and for a church bell are still to be supplied, but he adds confidently, "God is rich, and at the right time and the right hour it will be forthcoming."

THE NEW CHURCH AT IMPERIAL, NEB.

Built largely by contributions from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers

The citizens of Imperial are delighted to see their great need supplied, and through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD they send their heartfelt thanks to the many good friends in the East who have so kindly contributed to this good work.

Pastor Baylis is greatly beloved on those Western prairies. The Republican, published at Imperial, under date of August 4, 1899, says, in referring to his work: "He has done more for the town and church than any other minister we have ever had here. Besides being an earnest worker in the interests of Christianity, by his efforts he has succeeded in raising enough funds to pay for a suitable and comfortable building in which the people may worship." As for Pastor Baylis, he never ceases to thank God for the Bowery Mission, where his eyes were opened to see the folly of the sinner's course. It was there that

> He came to Jesus as he was:
> Weary and worn and sad;
> He found in him a resting place,
> And he has made him glad.

Thus, the little church on the Nebraska prairie, the happiness of its good pastor and the delight of its people, may all be clearly traced to the Redeeming Love which greeted the poor wanderer on that night when he entered the welcoming doors of the Bowery Mission, where so many other weary, sin-sick souls have found salvation and a new life.

Mr. Yatman in Australia

Rev. C. H. Yatman, whose Gospel career is well known to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, has been conducting a very successful evangelistic work in Australia. He reached Sydney on June 10. A remarkable series of meetings followed in the Exhibition Building, to which crowds of people were conveyed in free cars, and a deep impression was made upon the city by the preaching of the Word.

Mr. Yatman also held meetings for young women, the first of which took place on Sunday afternoon, July 9th. The Young Women's Christian Association co-operated, and are now taking up the work that the evangelist left. A final address to women was given in the Town Hall on July 16th. There were also children's meetings, to which the little ones thronged in overwhelming numbers.

On another occasion the evangelist talked to business men on the right use of money. On the final Sunday there was a vast gathering. At the close of his address many testified their desire to begin the heavenly life. It was a scene never to be forgotten.

The Stranger in Church

In the following letter from a reader in Nebraska we find a pleasing description of the sort of welcome a stranger likes to receive when visiting a church where every face is unfamiliar. It also furnishes a hint which some may study to advantage.

A few years ago, while staying over Sunday in a certain town, I strolled into one of the nearest churches. The usher, already on duty, with a bow and pleasant smile, showed me to a seat. The service commenced. The minister gave out the hymn, and the choir (a good one) started the singing, in which the whole congregation joined in with good will. After a splendid sermon, which made a good impression on me at least, and another song and prayer, the congregation went out. The usher stationed himself at the door, and, seeing me and several other newcomers, he gave each one of us a small card, on which was printed an invitation to come again and to visit the pastor at his residence. I thought to myself, after having read the card: "There are some pleasant and practical Christians in this church. I shall surely attend it if I ever come to this town again." Although it is nearly ten years since this incident happened, it lives fresh in my memory as if it had been yesterday.

I wish I could relate equally pleasant memories of all the churches where I have called as a stranger, but, alas! I cannot. At some churches the people have appeared cold and indifferent—even the sermon has seemed merely a form, which failed to make any other impression on the hearers than to make them sleepy. At such churches, the usher, the congregation and the minister need to be awakened to an understanding of "pure and undefiled Christianity," and to learn how to treat strangers who happen among them.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 24. Golden Text, Ps. 34 : 7

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

"THE angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them" (Ps. 34 : 7). Daniel knew this Scripture of truth; it had laid hold on him in such a way that in one extremity after another he counted on the Lord's deliverance. Daniel feared God, and therefore he feared neither the wrath of the king nor the sarcasm of his fellow-students in Babylon. Determined to be no Babylonian, but to put a difference between the holy and the unholy, the clean and the unclean (Lev. 10 : 8-10), he and his three friends took their stand in refusing the king's meat and the wine which he drank, certain that the Scripture would be fulfilled, and that the angel of the Lord, who "encampeth round about them that fear him," would deliver them. And so it was. His God in whom he trusted did not disappoint him.

Again, at the time of the students' examination, Daniel continued fearing God and trusting in him, and thus "God gave" him and his companions "knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom." It was not obtained by mere study; it was not the direct result either of natural talent or of persevering application, although doubtless both were present; it is distinctly said, "God gave them their knowledge and skill." It was of him, and not by accident, that "Daniel had understanding in all visions and dreams."

Daniel sought God's interests before his own; whether in public or in private, he acknowledged his God. Thus, when all the wise men of Babylon were sentenced to execution because they failed to recall and to interpret the king's dream, Daniel and his friends "desired mercies of the God of heaven concerning this secret that Daniel and his companions should not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon" (Dan. 2 : 17, 18).

Perhaps it was a sorer test when his three friends, not sitting "in the gate of the king" (Dan. 2 : 49) as he did, were expected, in their official character as governors over the affairs of the province of Babylon, to appear and to offer worship to the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar had set up. The same angel of the Lord who encampeth round about us encampeth round about every one who fears him, and will be as faithful to them as to us.

Ignored in the days of Belshazzar, the Lord put dignity upon Daniel and showed him things in the far future which are not yet fulfilled (Dan. 7 : 12), and he proved how a man who truly fears God, takes God into account in all things, can be trusted alike with honor and dishonor, neither uplifted by the one nor discouraged by the other. Thus, when raised again to prominence by the conquering Darius, after he had interpreted the ominous handwriting upon the wall to the guilty Belshazzar, Daniel was found again proof against fears for his own safety; even in the lions' den he would not be troubled about that which only affected him. He had the scripture about the angel of the Lord to run into and be safe.

Ezekiel was another type of a man who feared God, and the angel of the Lord delivered him in another way. Like Daniel, he had a manifestation of the Lord Jesus (comp. Ezek. 1 with Dan. 10). Like him also he had visions of the future, and like him he lived only for God and for his people. But while Daniel was called to a court life—life at a heathen court—Ezekiel was a companion of the captive Jews, sharing their exile, their sorrows and their shame.

To Ezekiel, God was indeed the God of the resurrection, but, therefore, he had to enter into death. In God's dealings with him by word and by vision he had to let death pass over all he was and had; he must speak, knowing that those to whom he spoke would not hearken unto him (3 : 7). He must, in vision, bear the iniquity of Israel and the iniquity of Judah upon him for 430 days, and he must eat his meat with carefulness, measuring both meat and drink (4). He must shave his head and his beard, and scatter the hair (5); he must move house (12); he must weep when his wife died (24). Disappointment, humiliation, death upon all he was and all he did; and yet, ever the vision of glory from time to time to sustain him; the angel of the Lord did not leave him. Thus he must show the people their death and corruption, that he might be able to show them the glory which yet awaiteth them, according to the Word of the Lord.

In Ezek. 36 and 37, the prophet sees and declares first the spiritual and then the literal resurrection of the people. Many there are indeed who take the latter as wholly spiritual. The event will show. The literal view of this and other passages, taking everything literally which is not manifestly spoken of as a figure, never precludes the accommodating of the passage to illustrate spiritual things. There is, it seems to us, a wonderful fitness in the spiritual resurrection of Israel as a nation in Ezek. 36, just preceding the calling of God's ancient people who had been true to him out of their graves in Ezek. 37, and giving to these whose very bones have been scattered, the land of Israel, as well as reigning power with Christ upon earth.

In our course of lessons we have had two on the Holy Spirit, one from Ezek. 47, and the other from Zech. 4. We have in Ezek. 47 a beautiful type of how man sinks out of sight as the Holy Spirit gains upon him. If the baptism of the Holy Ghost is once for all, when we are born again, yet he finds room in measure as we decrease, and the man with the measuring line alone knows how far we have sunk out of our own sight and the sight of others, as the Holy Spirit has taken up more and more of our thoughts and of our life to glorify Christ Jesus our Lord.

In Zech. 4 we see another side of the same truth; it is always the nothingness of men which is brought out in contrast to the power of God, in the working of the Holy Spirit. God tells us that our bodies are his temple. Why do we not believe God's Word instead of, as so many do, seeking for some wonderful experience which perhaps may have been granted to some special saint, but is not therefore the typical way in which God will lead us?

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

ABOUT ninety years are covered by the lessons of the past quarter. It is generally believed, though disputed by some able scholars, that Daniel, with other youths of noble families, was carried away captive in the year 606 B. C. The second temple was completed in 516, eighteen years after its foundation was laid. It is the interval between these two events, that the lessons have been concerned with. At the beginning of the period, there were many Jews in Babylon, and their number was augmented in 598, 588 and 582 by successive deportations. In 582, no Jews of any importance were left in Judea; all had been carried prisoners to Babylon. With the adroitness characteristic of the race in all times, they settled down and made the best use of such privileges as their masters allowed them. Although technically prisoners and slaves, they appear to have had considerable liberty and to have inspired respect among the ruling class. The king had need of such services as they could render, and especially of the fidelity and integrity which they displayed. They rose in the royal favor, Daniel becoming prime minister and his friends satraps of provinces. So matters prospered until the fall of the Empire before the growing power of Persia. Darius, the conqueror, continued the royal favor to Daniel and there are signs of other Jews being in places of honor. Then came the decree of Cyrus, permitting the Jews to return. About 45,000 of them availed themselves of the permission, and in 536 set out for their own land. From that time to the close of the period, our lessons have been occupied with their settlement there, the rebuilding of the temple and the addresses of the prophets, who encouraged the exiles in their arduous labor. They made no attempt to set up a kingdom, though they had at their head a representative of the royal house, but acquiesced in their position as a colony of Persia. It was a poor little [illegible] settlement surrounded by hostile people who had occupied the land during their absence in Babylon. [illegible] reached them from their brethren who had remained behind, but they must have had a hard and precarious life hemmed in by their hostile neighbors and embarrassed by the place of their exiles at the Persian court. That was the situation at the close of the sixth century, when our period ends.

Lion sentences appeared later (Daniel 6). [illegible] so much. There is an old story that a man of business who had an abstaining [illegible] his temperance principles. One day he returned from lunch with a flushed face and sparkling eyes. He said to his manager, "Ah, Mr. S., the world looks different to a man when he has a bottle of good wine in him." "I don't know about that," said the manager, "but I know he looks different to the world."

Waters to swim in (Ezekiel 47 : 5). A traveler in India conversed with one of their holy men who had undergone fearful tortures self-inflicted in the hope of [illegible] the miseries he had endured, and after all, to find that the man was still without the assurance of pardon. The traveler went on his way and spent about a year on his tour through the wonderful land. On his return, he stayed at the same city, and he thought he would look at the fakir again. The thought of him had recurred to him many times during his travels, but he was not in the place where he had seen him. He inquired for him and was directed to the place where he was then living. He found him, but to his amazement, the man was so changed that he would not have recognized him. A missionary had directed him to Christ and he had learned of that blood which cleanseth from all sin. The sense of purity, of having been cleansed from sin, which all his tortures had not given him, had come into [illegible] and had filled him with joy.

Their coats, their hosen and their hats (Daniel 3 : 21). The common dress of the time, as we learn from the articles exhumed by the Exploration Society from the ruins of Babylon, were a long linen garment reaching to the ankles, called here coats; a shorter woolen woven tunic, probably the one called here hosen, not stockings, as our translation implies; and the turban, described here as a hat. These, according to the story, were uninjured by the fire, which burned only the ropes with which they were bound. In the reign of Queen Mary of England, a clergyman, who had a large family dependent upon him, was a believer in the doctrines of the Reformation. His wife and his friends came around him and begged him for the sake of his children to preach nothing that could give offence to the priests. He was terribly depressed, but he yielded so far as to refrain from preaching on controverted questions. But that did not save him. He was denounced and condemned to be burned for heresy. Before his execution, he begged permission to speak. "I have kept silence for several months," he said, "on matters of faith on which I ought to have spoken: but the fire has done this much for me: it has burned the bonds which kept me silent. Even before it has touched my body, it has set me free. I am to be burned any way, so now I will speak the truth that is in me," and he proceeded to declare his faith.

Therefore I make a decree (Daniel 3 : 29). The deliverance induced the king to change his policy. It has sometimes happened that the deaths of martyrs have produced this effect. The prevision of it has cheered the hearts of the sufferers. When Latimer and Ridley were burned for their faith, Latimer was heard to say to his fellow martyr: "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man: we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England as I trust shall never be put out." It never has been put out, and still burns brightly.

. . . A Progressive Chicago Church . . .

Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage's Two Years' Pastorate in the Western Metropolis and its Results—An Inspiring Record of Co-Operative Christian Effort

JACOB BEIDLER G. E. NEWCOMB HUGH TEMPLETON

JEFFERSON PARK Presbyterian Church, of which Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage, son of the Editor of this journal, is pastor, is in the geographical centre of the city of Chicago and very near its centre of population. West of it is the beautiful little park which gives the name to the church, but, beyond the park in every direction are houses and flats, filled to overflowing with young and middle-aged people. Many of these people are strangers in Chicago—students at some of the many medical and dental colleges, or at the Art Institute, or young people from country homes, who have come to the great city to make a start in life all alone, and who must either breast its floods of temptation or sink forever.

It is a unique field, and needs an abounding Gospel and great adaptability and intense energy on the part of Christian workers. Such are the qualities which the young pastor has developed in his helpers in the church. Jefferson Park Church has enjoyed the ministrations of five pastors in the thirty-three years of its history. Rev. Robert Patterson was its first incumbent, and was followed by Rev. Dr. Francis L. Patton, now President of Princeton University, the memory of whose profound discourses still lingers in the sanctuary. In its thirty-three years it has changed from a church of families with children into a church of young people, individuals and young couples, with a sprinkling of gray heads for ballast. Before Mr. Talmage took the helm, the church had dwindled to a mere handful. The prayer-meetings were attended by scarcely two dozen people; the Sunday School was a small affair of possibly a hundred and fifty (better in proportion than the other branches of the church work), while the Christian Endeavor Society had apparently no wish to grow. The young pastor at once grasped the situation. He changed the atmosphere of the church. He laid his plans for the multitude. He entirely revolutionized the various church organizations, and set them at work to adapt themselves to each other and to bring into membership the hosts of young people just outside the church walls, who were only waiting to be asked, and then to care for and engage these in turn in Christian work after they came in. They came in by the scores and hundreds. The faithful ones, who had indeed "toiled all the night and had taken nothing," now let down their nets for a draught. They inclosed a great multitude, and among these many noble Christian workers.

Soon the prayer-meetings filled the lecture-room, and earnest, solemn after-meetings every Sabbath evening brought to open confession of faith those who had been stirred by the pastor's sermons. Attendance and membership of the Christian Endeavor Society ran up to about one hundred, and the prayer-meetings became helpful and evangelistic. Soon the church became the "Church of the Cordial Welcome," because no one was allowed to go from the prayer-meetings without a hand-shake and a kindly greeting from the pastor or helpers.

Next Mr. Talmage turned his attention to the Sunday School. He reorganized it on the basis of the primary, intermediate, junior and senior departments, selected competent chiefs for each department, and placed the whole school in charge of one of its old-time superintendents, who had come back to help him. By Easter of this year 311 new members had been added to the Sunday School roll, and the growth has continued until now its enrolled membership is 763, with an average attendance of about 400, and the contributions correspondingly increased.

JEFFERSON PARK PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, CHICAGO

And its Pastor, Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage

The Sunday School has several features that might be of value in other Sunday Schools. Among these are:

1st.—Recognitions of merit in the form of books or other suitable rewards.

2d.—As the greater part of the attendance is adult, there are several large Bible classes, each having a teacher who prepares the lesson, while another instructor takes charge of the social life of the class and sees to it that strangers are made acquainted and to feel at home.

3d.—Each class is numbered and each member of the school is numbered, and the superintendent keeps a register of the names and addresses of all its members; and sees to it that absentees are looked up and accounted for.

4th.—Accurate class-books are kept, showing whether or not each member contributed and whether or not he recited the Golden Text or Bible verses, or correctly answered questions on the lesson. Special recognition is given each member of the class having the best average in attendance, contributions, and memorizing the lesson, etc.

5th. There is a competent paid precentor, and a first-class paid orchestra leader and volunteer orchestra. The church organist is a fine musician, who has grown up in the church. The hymns and the prayers are chosen with a view to teach the lesson of the day.

The result is that no Sunday School in Chicago surpasses that of Jefferson Park in interest during the general exercises.

At the head of the centre aisle of the church auditorium are two beautiful, polished marble tablets. That on the west bears the name of Hugh Templeton, the "father of the church," whose saintly life was a benediction to his fellowmen; the easterly tablet is a memorial to Jacob Beidler, whose consecrated wealth carried the church through many financial straits and finally paid its debt and built its gallery, and thus provided seats for many young people, who formerly on Sunday evenings, stood up throughout the services. Mr. Beidler was a millionaire lumberman of Chicago, and to commemorate his benevolences to the church, this marble tablet was placed in the south wall by the trustees. For many years prior to his death in 1898, Mr. Beidler had regularly paid the interest on the $9,000 church debt, besides giving liberally to the various branches of the church work. In memory of their father, Mr. Beidler's children, only one of whom belongs to the Jefferson Park Church, united in paying the entire $9,000 of indebtedness, besides erecting a gallery to accommodate the increasing congregations, and redecorating the church auditorium, costing in all about $6,000. The gallery adds greatly to the beauty of the interior. Mr. Beidler's life was one of frugal thrift and Christian benevolence. His benefactions to Christian work in the latter part of his lifetime ran into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. Among the notable benefactions (besides his gifts to Jefferson Park Church) were $80,000 to Lake Forest University; $16,666 to the West Side department of the Chicago Y. M. C. A.; and $5,000 to the Presbyterian Hospital of Chicago, to found a free bed. His widow, who survives him, and David Beidler, one of his sons, are members of Jefferson Park Church, and in them the old church has found supporters stanch and true.

Such is Jefferson Park Church. Those who come to Chicago do would well to visit it. Its motto is:

"We work not for ourselves but for the Lord Jesus Christ."

A Rare Gospel Work

Progress of the Summer Campaign Conducted by Rev. S. Hartwell Pratt in the "Glad Tidings" Tent in New York

BY REV. T. DOUGLASS

THE crowded congregations, drawn from almost every sphere of life, seem matched only by the great preachers who occupy the desk in the big Gospel Tent, Glad Tidings, in New York City. Evangelist Pratt's natural selection faculty has been brought into play each successive week from the very start. If he hears of a popular preacher coming this way from abroad, he gets him. At home, no preacher seems able to say nay to his entreaties. The result is great preachers and great sermons!

Naturally, all sorts of folks are drawn to these tent services. One can see the most cultured people of the city there, sitting side by side with the ignorant and the outcast. It would be impossible to estimate the good accomplished; for ministers, church officers, members, teachers and others whose lives and teaching propagate Gospel truth are sure to pass on what they have heard and seen. It would not be surprising if many a church should be revived and take on new life. What a blessed outcome of the tent work this would be! Some of the conversions are remarkable. On the second week of the campaign (this is the eleventh) a man just merging into middle life, who had spent all his days in sin, shambled into the tent with an unsteady gait. His was one of those hopeless cases men speak of. He was the only child of a godly widow. But, when old enough, he left home and gave full swing to sinful inclinations. His poor mother, broken-hearted, struggled alone to eke out a bare living. After many years she sickened. A telegram came to him, saying:

"Mother is dying. Come if you would see her alive."

When he got there, she had been dead ten minutes. She died calling for her boy and praying for him. He fainted and fell to the floor. But even this did not reform him. He went back to his old life of drink and recklessness. The Spanish-American war attracted him. He enlisted in one of the New York volunteer regiments, and found himself in Chickamauga, assigned as a nurse to 150 men, many of whom were dying of fever. Death had no terrors for him. Army life did not improve his morals. On being mustered out, he came to this city, and, in a most deplorable condition, listened to the sweet singing and the pathetic preaching in the Gospel Tent. It was the "power of God unto salvation" to him. It was a genuine conversion, as his life has since proved. He was soon taken sick, and while in the hospital many weeks his humble, sweet Christian spirit won for him the respect of the doctors, the nurses and the patients. He began at once to tell what God had done for a man who had sunk almost as low as any human being can sink, and he was the means of bringing one person to Christ. Now, what a transformation! He is clean in person and in speech. He says that he is willing to do anything, and to suffer anything for Christ, if need be. It would be hard to find a happier man than Arthur I—— in New York.

I have watched this tent work week by week, and as one of the pastors of this city I cannot commend it too highly. It deserves the best support, both morally and otherwise, of all who would see our city, of which we are justly proud, lifted higher in the sphere of morals.

The Greatest Detective

IT is a chronic habit with many to denounce newspapers. Indeed, all of us at times have suffered injustices inflicted by reporter's pen and printer's type. But it is a good time just now to speak of the newspaper as the greatest of all detectives. All the pulpits, and platforms, and lyceums, and social circles might have declaimed against the recent Ramapo water steal and the mal treatment of Dreyfus, not more on Devil's Island than amid the hullabaloo of the French court-room, yet neither abomination would have been halted. But the editors and reporters with their sharp pens stabbed to death the gigantic swindle that threatened New York, and make possible the deliverance of that Frenchman whose one offence is that he belongs to the same race that furnished the world a Moses, a Paul and a Christ.

There are thousands of men in positions of trust who have less fear of the law and the prison than they have of the press. Jurors and judges may sometimes be bought, and with skillful attorneys wielding the technicalities of the case, the criminal may escape; but let the newspapers get on the track of a great municipal or racial injustice and it is overtaken and exposed and flagellated.

The only hope for Dreyfus is in the cloud of journalists that hover over Rennes, France, by day and night. The Court Martial would days ago have closed their work and have given Dreyfus the second installment of darkness and hunger and chains; but the morning and evening and extra newspapers scare them into a semi-idiocy which babbles and bawls and becomes the laughing-stock of eastern and western hemispheres. No one but the Lord Almighty can foresee what the judges will do. They are in utter bewilderment. They dare not do right. They want to grind Dreyfus into the dust and yet have the good will of Christendom. The degradation which Dreyfus suffered four years ago, when they took away his sword and tore off his insignia, was nothing compared with the degradation that the French nation is this hour enduring.

Men of the printing-press, and reporters of all nations! keep your pens and presses going until justice is done. Let us every day witness the disgraceful scenes of the French court-room, and hear the stump-speeches of the brainless and heartless pursuers of this imposed-upon Israelite. Show up the infamy of those sworn to well and truly try this prisoner. Make the telegraph-wires of all nations click with the perfidy, and cowardice, and hate hurled at an innocent man. Under God, I believe the printing-press will yet free Dreyfus. Men of pen and type! you can do it. God help you! Before these words appear, the great national farce may have the curtain dropped upon it. It is the indecency of this last decade of the nineteenth century.

Notice that the rule recognized in all other court-rooms, the world over, is reversed by this court-room. The universal rule adopted is, "Believe a man innocent till he is proved guilty," but the conspicuous rule at Rennes is, "Believe Dreyfus guilty until he can be proved innocent." That will not work well either in time or eternity. The bang of the pistol that shot down Labori, the illustrious counsel for the defendant, was only an echo of the defamation and perjury and demoniac wrath aimed at the prisoner. But all such diabolism must fail. Let righteousness triumph, though every officer of that army be affronted, and France be revolutionized! Meanwhile, thanks to the New York printing-press, which stopped the Ramapo outrage, saving the city hundreds of millions of dollars; and may the same influence array Dreyfus in brighter uniform than that which was torn from his shoulders by an ignominious verdict, and give back to him the home which his heroic wife keeps ready for his coming!

Reformatory Work

IT is said that only about one in ten men in mercantile life achieve a complete success. The rest make little headway; many utterly fail. The proportion of ministers who might have been better doctors or lawyers, or farmers or shoemakers or blacksmiths, is probably larger than this. The Massachusetts Reformatory for young criminals lately reports that in Deer Island prison, seventy-five per cent. have been previous inmates. This might be regarded as discouraging. But if twenty-five in every one hundred in such institutions have been reclaimed or turned to honest pursuits, officials regard their work successful. This would seem about the general ratio for the best reformatory work. Of course, the older the inmates, the smaller the ratio of success.

But it is unsafe to make statistics by figures the test. In the parable of the lost sheep, there was but one in one hundred that was found; in the parable of the pieces of money, one in five; of the sons, one in two. The value of one soul saved can not be overestimated. One Ingersoll reclaimed would have been worth hundreds of inferior men—one Saul of Tarsus. The true principle is this: "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand. For thou knowest not which shall prosper, this or that, or whether both shall be alike good." God's sovereignty is in nature; it is just so in grace.

Two Railroad Presidents

THE death of Frank Thomson and the immediate election of A. J. Cassett, as Superintendent of the Pennsylvania Railroad, show the high estimate set upon civil service elevation. Both of these men have been railroading since their boyhood; possessed a thorough knowledge of the Pennsylvania system and its resources, and seemed to have secured their honorable recognition because they deserved it. The Company acted on business principles—sought the best man for the best place.

This choice is a reflection upon the practice of making appointments for political reasons. Think of choosing the President of the Pennsylvania Railroad for such reasons. With all the vast moneyed interests at stake, think of the directors of the greatest of all railroads on this continent regarding anything but genius for railroading, experience in railroading, capacity in railroading, as a reason for putting a man in the position of president. Mr. Cassett is perhaps the best known, the most influential railroad man in the country. Such a man the country demands, all railroad, all public interests demand. In 1859 a graduate of the Troy Polytechnic Institute, Mr. Cassett began as a roadman in the service of the Pennsylvania Railroad. He has served all the way up: has been assistant engineer, resident engineer, superintendent of motive power and machinery, general superintendent, general manager, director, and vice-president; everywhere acknowledged as a man of exceptional ability; and now he succeeds Frank Thomson because he is the stuff that railroad presidents ought to be made of.

Brought Up to Do Chores

EVERY country boy, who has a home in New England, knows the meaning of the phrase "doing chores." It is a lot to which all country boys have to be apprenticed. If there is a cow, she has to be fed, watered, milked, driven to pasture. If there is a horse, he has to be groomed, harnessed and unharnessed, and driven. If there is wood, it has to be sawed, split, piled, brought in. Fires have to be kindled. If there is a garden, it has to be hoed; fruit, it has to be gathered. If there is an errand to the store, or to the neighboring farmer, this is the function of the boy who does chores.

All this is education and disciplinary. Every boy who begins by waiting upon himself, upon his brothers and sisters, and especially upon his mother, is taking lessons in life which will always be of value. These details of work about the house, with which choring makes him acquainted, he will find of great use hereafter. He can not be surprised in whatever new situation he may find himself. I know a lad who likes to ride around with the groceryman. This lad is being taught the groceryman's trade. He came into the house the other day, exulting: "Mother, I harnessed and unharnessed the groceryman's horse to-day." Who can tell what service the education of that single day may do to himself, or to some one else dependent upon him? Boys, take the duty of doing chores as another schooling. Do not hesitate. Learn everything you can, not only from books, but from chores, also.

The Perils of Christian Science

THE recent meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria, in New York City, occurred none too early. All over the country we hear of the victims of this great delusion. If it were true, sickness and death would be abolished. It is not true, and those that believe it so are victims and makers of victims. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes in prayer, in the prayer of faith. Prayer helps the sick, comforts the dying. Doubtless it often breaks the illusion of an imaginary sickness, and at the word of the human healer the bedridden arise and walk. And the disclosures of the Judgment Day alone will reveal how great has been its real value. But here is a new philosophy, the "allness of God," and those that accept it, when sick, decline to apply to physicians, reject the approved methods of medical science, and allow their own relatives to pass out of the world, when proper professional care would have alleviated their suffering, and might have saved their lives.

Mighty as was the great Physician, he did not speak disparagingly of the use of means. He himself anointed with clay the eyes of the blind. If he commanded the bedridden to rise, he furnished the supernatural power. There is no record of an awful collapse, when the patient undertakes to obey. Imagination, strength of will will go a great way. But the writer once had in his parish a woman of excellent character and great religious activity, who died of an internal tumor, and yet who said to him the very day of her death that she trusted in what she and her relatives called "the prayer of faith." I know that faith healers and Christian scientists have no dealings with each other. But in this they are alike; they speak against the use of means. God honors the use of means. What we call nature's laws are God's laws. God honors the study of anatomy and physiology and pathology. There is help to the sick which comes from the mind. Without faith it is impossible to please God. So also without means, without will and courage, it is impossible to please him.

The neglect of proper means to secure health is just as criminal as the effort to destroy health: and the guardians of health, the intelligent, the virtuous ought to be on the alert to check a delusion which almost daily results fatally. "The allness of God" is nowhere more manifest than in exacting the penalty of infringing on natural laws.

BRIEF NOTES

Eleven million books and tracts have been circulated in China by the Religious Tract Society during the past ten years.

Dr George Adam Smith sailed for home last week. His services at Yale, Chicago and Chautauqua will be long gratefully remembered.

A leading Baptist journal states as a well ascertained fact, that there are thirty million persons in South America who have never seen a Bible.

The Moravians have voted $80,000 for the expense of establishing new mission stations in South Africa, on the Mosquito coast, in Nicaragua and in Labrador.

Royalty has its duties in these democratic days. The number of documents to which Queen Victoria set her signature during the past twelve months exceeded fifty thousand.

Mr D. L. Moody preached in the Gospel Tent in New York on August 26. The following day he occupied the pulpit of the Fifth Ave. Church, of which the late Dr. John Hall was pastor.

David Livingstone's daughter will soon take up missionary work on the west coast of Africa. The Congregationalist says: "She is her father's child in spirit as well as in flesh and blood."

The Chicago Tribune, having kept a record of crime for ten years, declares that the saloon business of the United States is directly chargeable with a total of 53,436 murders during that time.

Japan is adopting the philanthropic side of Christianity. It has now not only a Red Cross Society, but a prison reform league, hospitals, dispensaries, orphan asylums, and other benevolent institutions.

The German Empress, at her own expense, has established fourteen Deaconess' stations in Berlin, from which 105 sisters proceed to serve gratuitously as nurses to the sick, especially among the poor and destitute.

Secessions from the Roman Catholic church in Austria, Bohemia, and Southern Germany, continue. It is said that the number of persons who have joined Protestant churches during the present year is not less than twelve thousand.

A daily prayer meeting is now held in Boston, Mass. About forty to fifty persons assemble at noon, in Tremont Temple, Room A, and hold a meeting for about an hour, when requests by mail and personal presentation are made the subject of prayer.

The American Baptist Year Book for 1899 shows in its statistical tables a total for the United States of 42,893 churches, 28,409 ministers and 4,141,995 members. For the entire world there are given 50,143 churches, 33,553 ministers and 4,910,456 members.

An important discovery is announced in the Christian Intelligencer. It is of a tablet dated in the reign of Ammi-Zaduga, who reigned in Babylon 2140 B. C., which is earlier than the call of Abraham. It refers to the Deluge, and contains poetry of a high order of literary merit.

Missionary work in Japan will be seriously hindered if the Parliament passes the law now under consideration, which aims to exclude religious instruction altogether from those public schools and from such private ones as accept the modified military service that is now one of their chief attractions.

English journals report enormous congregations at Regent Park Chapel, London, where Dr. George C. Lorimer, of Boston, Mass., has been preaching during the summer. Such crowds as have gathered to hear the famous American preacher have not often been seen in city churches during the hot weather.

A Baptist journal calls attention to the remarkable coincidence that a church at Salem, Caroline Co., Va., has had only three pastors in seventy-nine years, and all three bore the same name. The present pastor, Rev. Andrew Broadus, had for his predecessors in his pulpit his father and grandfather, who also were named Andrew Broadus.

Dreyfus on Trial

JURISTS, the world over, have watched with amazement the proceedings of the court martial at Rennes, France, which, during the past four weeks, has been trying Captain Dreyfus. While admitting that the French people have the right to manage their own affairs in their own way, there is general surprise at the methods adopted. The question to be decided is whether Dreyfus did, or did not, communicate important military secrets to the German government, and in particular whether he was the writer of a certain document called the Bordereau. Instead of hearing evidence on this question, the judges have allowed witnesses to rehabilitate their own reputation; to express their opinions on the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, and to withhold their reasons for forming such opinions. All this is a violation of the ordinary rules of evidence adopted by other civilized nations, and it does not appear to be fair to the accused, nor to tend to elicit the truth. The facts in the case are simple. In September, 1894, a person employed by the French government as a spy, found in the offices of the German ambassador, in Paris, a letter in which the writer referred to five documents which accompanied the letter, all of which described matters relating to French army life. One described a new cannon introduced into the artillery; three described various methods of drill which had been adopted by the French army, and the fifth related to Madagascar. These documents were not found, but only the letter enumerating them. This is the letter called the Bordereau. It was evident that some one holding high position in the French army was imparting military secrets to the Germans. The chiefs of the army came to the conclusion that the guilty man was Captain Dreyfus, the only Jew on the General Staff. He was arrested, tried by court-martial and condemned. This occurred in 1894. Since that time Dreyfus has been imprisoned on a lonely island off the coast of South America and has been treated with gross brutality. Meanwhile, his friends had been working to secure a revision of his case. Certain facts were ascertained which showed that the court-martial which condemned him was influenced by secret documents that neither he nor his lawyer was allowed to see. One of those documents was certainly forged, and there is a strong suspicion that the others were fraudulent. Many influential men were convinced that Dreyfus had been made a scapegoat to shield the real culprit. Eventually application was made to the courts, and a new trial was ordered. Dreyfus was brought back to France, and has now been on trial for four weeks. If the trial had taken place in America he would certainly be acquitted, for no evidence proving his guilt has been submitted to the court. But there is a strong anti-Jewish sentiment in France, which is particularly active in the army, and there is also a realization that a verdict of acquittal for Dreyfus would be practically a condemnation of his accusers. As these are generals, while among the seven officers who are his judges there is none holding a higher rank than that of colonel, it will require some courage on the part of the members of the court to pronounce a judgment adverse to their superior officers. These influences may operate against Dreyfus, and may lead to his condemnation, in spite of the warning that God gives in his Word:

He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the just; even they both are abomination to the Lord (Prov. 17: 15).

A Fortune Sacrificed

A young lady in Chicago has unwittingly sacrificed her prospect of inheriting an enormous fortune. It appears that in her infancy she was adopted by a gentleman living in New Hampshire and was carefully educated. She was brought up as one of his own family, though she was well aware that she was not really his daughter. When she attained the age of nineteen, her guardian died, but she was not deprived of a home. His brother, a multi-millionaire of Chicago, invited her to become a member of his family intending to leave her his entire fortune. But the girl had an ambition to become an actress and one of her first statements on reaching her new home was of her determination to go on the stage. Her new guardian argued and pleaded with her, but without stating his intentions. The girl listened, but would not be persuaded. Finding that she would receive no help from him in attaining her ambition, she left his house secretly and in a few days notified him that she had obtained employment and would not return. Probably if she had known that by remaining with him, she would inherit his millions, she would not have been so determined to go. Few girls are so infatuated that they would knowingly sacrifice a fortune for such a career. Unhappily, however, there are many of both sexes who sacrifice a still better prospect to enjoy the pleasures of sin though they are warned of the loss their conduct will entail.

Your iniquities have turned away these things and your sins have withholden good things from you (Jer. 5: 25).

A Physician Bitten

A remarkable accident to a hospital doctor is reported by the New York Herald. It appears that among the patients in the Post-Graduate Hospital, was a child who was suffering from diphtheria. The disease made such progress that it became necessary to perform an operation. The child was laid on the operating table and the surgeon proceeded to make the incision. While he was busy with his work, the gag which held the child's jaws apart, slipped, and instantly the teeth closed on the surgeon's finger. As it was lacerated, he understood that the poisonous saliva would reach his own system. He therefore, took immediate precautions to counteract its effects. In spite of his care, however, blood-poisoning declared itself in a few days. The hand and arm swelled badly, and the doctor was obliged to take to his bed. Four physicians have been in attendance upon him, and one operation has already been performed. It is expected that another may be necessary to save his life. No blame attaches to the child for the injury, as she was unconscious when her teeth involuntarily closed on the doctor's finger. But there have been instances in which a benefactor has been intentionally hurt by the person whom he was trying to benefit. Such ingratitude is peculiarly disgraceful and it is shown by every person who, having been saved, falls again into sin.

They crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame (Heb. 6: 6).

Fatal Collapse of a Building

A disaster involving the loss of ten, and probably a larger number of lives, occurred at Chicago on Aug. 28. For some time past, a Pittsburg firm has been busy putting in place twelve gigantic iron arches on a site on the east side of Wabash Avenue. They were intended to support a huge building to be called the Coliseum, in which large conventions, horse-shows etc. could be held. The last of the arches was put in place on Aug. 26 and two days later, the contractor proceeded to remove the derrick-traveler and paint the iron work. While the men were at work, the first arch was seen to sway violently and then slowly fall toward the South. The other arches had been rivetted to it and one by one each arch fell. They lay in parallel lines flat on the ground. Each arch weighed thirty-four tons and not more than two minutes passed from the first warning motion until all the twelve lay on the ground. It is believed that thirty-five men were at work on the arches when the collapse came. There was no time to save themselves, nor could persons on the ground escape. Ten dead bodies were quickly taken out and seven injured men were found and taken to the hospital. It is feared that other bodies will be found when the debris is removed. The cause of the collapse is at present a mystery. The most probable explanation is that the sand on which the concrete foundations of the arches rested, must have shifted under the weight and so have thrown one of the arches out of plumb. If so, it is another example of the blunder of which our Lord spoke in concluding his Sermon on the Mount, when he compared the man who heard his commands but did not obey them to a man building his house on the sand—a course which is equally disastrous both in material building and in moral character:

A foolish man who built his house on the sand . . . and it fell and great was the fall of it (Matt. 7: 26, 27).

CAPTAIN DREYFUS ON TRIAL BEFORE THE COURT MARTIAL AT RENNES

A New Counterfeit Note

Information comes from the Secret Service Bureau, in Washington, D. C., that a dangerous counterfeit two-dollar note has been received from New York. It is a Treasury note, bearing the portrait of McPherson. It was produced by the photo-etching process, and is printed on soft fibrous paper. The lines on the back are produced by means of ink instead of silk, and the blue lines of the original are green in the counterfeit. These lines appear chiefly on the back of the note. The seal is dark red instead of pink, and the whole note has a flat appearance, lacking the light and shade effects of the genuine paper. The Treasury number is printed too heavily, and part of the figures of the original number can be discerned under the rib number of the counterfeit. Taken by itself, the note would easily deceive the ordinary observer, but when compared with a genuine note the discrepancies are seen easily. Only one note has been discovered, and there is no clue as yet to the counterfeiters. The danger of these counterfeit notes is in proportion to the closeness of their resemblance to the genuine. The more like they are, the more easily do they deceive the public. It is so with counterfeit Christians. The better and more active they are in religious work, and the more consecrated they appear to be, the more people will they deceive. No harm would be done by them if people did not think they were genuine Christians.

They come unto thee as my people cometh, and they sit before thee as my people, and they hear thy words, but they will not do them: for with their mouth they show much love, but their heart goeth after their covetousness (Ezek. 33: 31).

Betrayed by His Plunder

The fact of a burglar having a chiming clock among the proceeds of a raid on a Brooklyn house is the cause of his being in prison awaiting trial. A police captain, walking from his home after dinner, to his station-house, noticed a man coming out of an area gate. He was carrying a bundle, but looked like an ordinary citizen going to his work. As the captain passed, the man halted for a moment, resting his hand on the stone pillar at the foot of the stoop. The captain looked him over and noticed that he was well dressed, but he noticed also the suspicious circumstance that the house was shut up, as if the family were away. "What have you in the bundle?" the captain asked in a tone of polite interest. "Only some women's clothes," was the reply. "They belong to my sister. She lives here, but she is out of town and I am sending these things to her." This explanation seemed reasonable but the captain asked, to make sure, "Nothing but women's clothes?" The man replied coolly: "No, nothing else." But at that moment, as the captain was resuming his walk, a soft, mellow chime sounded from the bundle, betraying the presence of a clock. "Ah," said the captain, "women's clothes do not make that noise. You will have to come with me." Very unwillingly the man complied, and at the station-house the bundle was opened, revealing a clock and a quantity of silver spoons, forks, etc. Some skeleton keys and other burglars' tools completed the proof that the man was a burglar and that the goods in his possession were stolen. Though it is very common for the criminal himself to unwittingly furnish the clue that leads to his detection, it is not often that his booty finds a voice to proclaim his guilt; but we are warned that God can make even inanimate things the accusers of wrongdoers.

The stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber shall answer it (Hab. 2: 11).

... PORTO RICO'S APPEAL NOT IN VAIN ...

Generous-Hearted Readers Sending Gifts and Prayers for the Stricken People The Sufferers Hail the Relief Work

A GREAT cry of gratitude comes from Porto Rico. At no time in the island's history, have its people experienced such kindness as they are now receiving, in their time of deep distress, at the hands of the Americans. Cargoes of food and clothing are arriving at San Juan from United States ports, the gifts of our people, and the relief work instituted by Gen. Davis continues while the supplies last. It is a systematic and well-organized work. Rations are given out regularly to feed the destitute women, children and aged men, while the able-bodied adults are supplied with work, as far as possible. But there is neither provision nor money enough to do more than relieve those that stand on the fringe of the distressed multitudes. It is estimated that $5,000 per day can be spent for the next two or three months in relieving the appalling number of cases of actual destitution and suffering alone. President Eames, of the Health Board of San Juan, in describing the local situation there, writes that there are a great many cases of sickness, but he has no place to put the sufferers and no means to assist them. "What I can do now without money, I do not know," he adds. He hopes to establish a hospital.

EFFECTS OF THE STORM ON THE CRISTOBAL COLON PLAZA SAN JUAN

The cathedral appears in the background in which The Christian Herald Special Relief Fund

Nearly every town and village in the island is short of funds and has asked for relief. The once beautiful and fertile valleys now present sad pictures of desolation and ruin. One can ride miles without seeing a single house standing upright. Plantations, haciendas, sugar factories, cane fields—all are levelled. Near Bayamon, there is a great blockade in the highway, through which the river rushes; over 400 wrecked and shattered dwellings are in that barrier of rubbish.

Captain McComb, U. S. A., has made a report of the effect of the storm at Arecibo and surrounding territory, the substance of which is given in the San Juan News in a late issue. He says:

Near the conclusion of the storm the wind shifted suddenly and permitted the immense quantity of water which had collected in the valley of the Rio Grande to descend upon the town, accelerated its movement and precipitated it with force in a northerly direction. The old river mouth was entirely unable to disgorge such an amount of water, and the lower part of the town and the great sweep of cane lands near here were heavily flooded. Many houses up in the valley were swept away, the inhabitants being in many cases carried off in them and drowned.

The flood was the most disastrous ever experienced in the district, and has not only swept away the houses of many, but has entirely destroyed their crops and fruit trees. In the uplands, the coffee, which was in berry, has been shaken and lost; in the lowlands, the cane crop has been either in part washed away or so crushed as to be worthless.

A large number of lives have been lost from the flood and falling trees. The town is rapidly filling up with homeless and starving people. In the town itself much damage was done by the floods and many houses being beaten down or unroofed, and stores of food or crop lost.

I consider it absolutely necessary to issue a certain amount of food to those who have lost everything from the storm and flood. I recommend that 10,000 rations of the class indicated be shipped here by water as the railroad and wagon roads are impassable.

Assistance in the way of clothing and food is necessary for the people of the district to avoid suffering and further loss of life.

Reports from other localities published in the same journal, although fragmentary, afford an idea of its tremendous extent and terribly destructive power. The great rivers were swollen to the proportion of mighty torrents and swept everything before them. Native towns, villages, large buildings and plantations disappeared. At some points, as many as 500 valuable cattle, comprising an entire herd, might have been seen floating down the swift current. Whole houses were afloat, their occupants vainly hoping to find some secure lodgment, only to be tossed and assailed until the structure parted and the helpless ones were engulfed in the torrent of waters. At one of the devastated towns near San Juan, Manuel Ruiz, a leading citizen, was entertaining guests when the storm broke. Soon the waters swept the house from its foundation. As it fell, Miss Panchita Gomez, a beautiful young guest, grasped a little child and tried to save it. Her body was found afterward with the dead child clasped in her arms. The Ruiz family and all their guests perished, including three women and nine children. Reports from smaller towns show much suffering. At Ysabela, half the town was destroyed, all the merchandise and growing crops ruined. Quabredillas had many houses overturned and unroofed, and crops suffered greatly. Nearly all the dwellings in Habello were either unroofed or levelled. At Lares, the crops are a total loss. Barceloneta is filled with homeless and starving poor. Jayuya, where eighty perished, is also a scene of general distress. Butillos has nothing standing but the church, and the condition of the people is wretched in the extreme. At Nameas and Ciales, the crops are gone. Yabucoa has already buried over eighty victims, but there are 200 bodies still unrecovered from the debris. The people throughout the entire district are absolutely starving and in need of immediate aid.

VICTIMS OF THE CYCLONE—A FAMILY MOURNING THE LOSS OF ALL THEIR EARTHLY POSSESSIONS

THE WRECKED BARRACKS OF TROOP F, 5TH U. S. CAVALRY

Efforts are now being made to relieve as many of these places as possible, but the means at the disposal of Governor-General Davis do not permit a very widely-extended relief movement. Several hundred men are at work clearing the streets of Ponce. On all sides are heard expressions of gratitude for the timely aid sent from the United States, mingled, however, with solicitude for the fate of the thousands of hapless sufferers in the interim, whom it has thus far been impossible to reach.

The Porto Rican Women's Aid Society, of which Mrs. Guy V. Henry is President, is working zealously in behalf of the sufferers. Their appeal to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has touched many hearts.

Our photographs on these two pages were forwarded from Porto Rico by Mr. Zerah C. Collins, Secretary at San Juan of the Army and Navy Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Collins writes:

Your cablegram at hand . . . You were very thoughtful and we will see that none of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S children are allowed to suffer. The latest news from the interior shows that it is there where the greatest suffering will come . . . It is a great problem for our government.

I am sending you photos of the effects of the storm in this vicinity. The unroofed theatre is where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School is held.

RUINED BUILDINGS ALONG THE WATER FRONT AT SAN JUAN

Mrs. Guy V. Henry, President of the Women's Aid Society of Porto Rico, has prepared the following letter to be issued through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the Christian mothers and daughters of America, in behalf of the suffering women and children of Porto Rico:

"A country devastated by flood and famine cries out to us for aid at once. Not like India, or Armenia, or Russia, calling from a foreign soil, and under a foreign flag, but with our own flag waving over its municipal buildings, and carried through the streets by its little children singing 'America'; the land they already love and look to for aid now that flood and destruction have laid waste that delightful island.

"Many of the little children who have held that flag with loving reverence, lie to-day dead from the awful tornado. Shall the cry of the homeless, starving people, who welcomed us but a few months ago with gentle voice and open arms, fall on deaf ears and plead in vain to unsympathizing hearts?

"Thousands of homes are washed away. Thousands and thousands of men, women and children are starving, and a frightened, timid little people stand helpless with faces turned toward their new country, looking for protection and aid.

"Hear the call, O great American people, and rise with grand response as one hand stretched out, and send help! Let the Stars and Stripes unfurl gloriously over a land lifted from awful desolation. With the strength of a mighty nation let us carry them over this state of suffering, until fruits and fields in that delightful island shall yield again, under God's smile, a thousandfold of increase and the brotherhood of the great American people shall shine out gloriously before the whole world.

MRS. GUY V. HENRY."

It is probable that a great deal of the relief work yet to be done in Porto Rico may devolve upon the Woman's Aid Society, especially that part of the work which has to do with the women and children. Mrs. John V. R. Hoff is the representative of the Society on the field, and she is actually at work with her aids, giving materials, comfort and consolation to the sufferers.

It is especially urged that Sunday schools and all young people's societies and organizations for Christian work should seize this golden opportunity of rendering service "In His Name," to these helpless and destitute islanders.

All contributions for the relief work sent to this journal will be promptly acknowledged. The contributions received during the week were as follow:

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

The Family Altar

The Precious Privilege of Family Prayer
Suggestions for Its Conduct

IT is a sad fact that the beautiful old custom of family prayer is not observed in every home. The heads of every household should establish such a custom; and they should study to make this hour of family reunion so sweet, benign, and helpful that nobody would miss it for any consideration. Select your chapters or verses carefully, beforehand. Encourage every one to have some pretty text ready. Think of a circle of texts like these: "Walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love, endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace;" "Be ye kind to one another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you;" "Be kindly affectioned one to another, in honor preferring one another;" "My people shall dwell in a peaceful habitation, and in sure dwellings and in quiet resting places:" "Cast thy burden upon the Lord and he shall sustain thee." Such words would carry strength, refreshment and good counsel to help us through the day, and also to bind us to one another. Each member of the circle should be encouraged to offer up a few words of individual petition after the opening prayer, and of course the Lord's Prayer should be said in concert. One or two stanzas of a cheerful, tender hymn might be sung. Exercises need not be long; they can always be delightful; the leader should study to make them so. Each member of the circle might be made leader in turn.

Dr. Gulick, Director of the Chautauqua Parents' School, said recently:

I have taken tests at different places to find how large a part of those who were raised in families where they had family prayer, take part in that exercise now. I find that the per cent. is under forty. There must be a reason for this. The reasons given are of two kinds, one relating to the pressure of business for the head of the family, and the other to the difficulty of getting the children to school in time when they are detained for any reason. These seem superficial. The busiest man finds time for the daily paper and will tell you that it is necessary to his business success. The conclusion then must be drawn that if he thoroughly believed that family prayer was a necessary thing he would find time for it. We must come back to the Bible, to its use in the family circle. Childhood is the very best time for a person to learn parts of the Bible which shall stand him in good stead later on. Before a child reaches his teens is the only period in which these truths can become woven into his life and become as second nature.

Another reason for coming back to the custom of family prayer and the reading of the Bible therein, is that it will form an effectual link between the head of the family and the other members who are all too surely drifting apart and having fewer interests in common.

Harry's "Hurt Feelings"

"Nobody loves me," said small Harry, "whose feelings had been hurt by something or nothing," as his auntie put it. "Do you love anybody?" she asked. "Why, yes," he said. "Then you have the best of it." Harry didn't see it that way. "Harry, who are the nice people?" "Nobody," he said promptly, "for nobody loves me." "If anybody is loving, then—can love heaps and heaps—they are nice, aren't they?" "Yes." "Then, Harry, if you love us all, and we don't love you, you are the nicest, and you ought to be sorry for us all." Whereupon Harry had to laugh. Perhaps none of us would suffer so much from "hurt feelings" if we realized that to be loving and considerate is the better part, whether appreciated or not.

A "Shut-In's" Message

On a recent visit to a "shut-in," the writer was given by her these beautiful words of Phillips Brooks, with the expressed hope that they might come under the eye of other "shut-ins," and be a comfort to them.

"It may be that God used to give you plentiful chance to work for him. Your days went singing by, each winged with some enthusiastic duty for the Master whom you loved. . . . You can be idle for him, if so he will, with the same joy with which you once labored for him. The sick-bed or the prison is as welcome as the harvest-field or the battle-field, when once your soul has come to value as the end of life, the privilege of seeking and of finding him."

The Princess' Garden

The Empress Frederick, of Germany, when England's little Princess Royal, was troubled with a quick temper. Even to her gentle and indulgent father, Prince Albert, she was known at times to speak angry words.

Queen Victoria, her wise and kind mother, did not punish her little daughter for these outbursts of temper, but one day gave her a little garden for her very own, and advised, when anger got the best of her judgment, that she go out to the garden and work for a few moments. The plan acted like a charm, and a very few moments among the smiling faces of her flower friends brought the little Princess to a happier mood. After she became Empress of a great country, when affairs of importance harassed her, she would slip out among her blossoms, and the silent companionship of the little pansy faces, the fragrant rosebuds and the modest violets seemed to give her strength to cope with difficulties and troubles.

The Friendly Duck

The owner of a fine barnyard of fowls, relates the following as one of a number of instances to show that animals almost show human pity and kindness to each other: Among some fifty or sixty head of fowls he once had a solitary bantam hen. She became nearly blind and kept in a [illegible] corner of the [illegible]. Here she might, perhaps, have starved, but for the constant and sympathetic attention of a duck. Twice daily, so long as the poor bantam [illegible] duck was seen to fill her capacious beak with from twenty to thirty grains of barley, with which she proceeded to the fowl house and there deposited it in front of the bantam.

A Flower of the Ancients

Recently at a Windsor flower show, says a London newspaper, there was exhibited a bunch of blossoming sweet peas in a pot. They were said to be from seed taken from the tomb of an Egyptian mummy supposed to have been buried over 2,000 years ago. The plant is described as below the ordinary sweet pea in size, but the flower, pink and white, was of a delicate nature. Most seeds lose their vitality under ordinary conditions in a few years, but stories have been told before this of good wheat found in mummy cases. If the statement in regard to the sweet peas is true, how strange it seems that these seeds—from Cleopatra's garden, it may be—were more immortal than the proud and powerful queen!

A German Marriage Custom

The dowry is a prerequisite to marriage in Germany. What is called a dowry varies from $40 to as many thousands. The lower sum is respectable for a serving maid. In the army the sum is regulated by law. Officers are usually poor: their salaries, with allowances, range from $9 a week for a lieutenant to $50 a week for a major-general. Imperial law does not permit an officer under the rank of major to marry at all, unless he has a private income, or unless the dowry his wife brings him reaches a designated figure. This figure is $20,000 for a lieutenant and grades down to $5,000 for a major. The dowry is paid over, not to the husband, but to the Government, which doles out to the couple after marriage three per cent. on the amount received. Out of the army the system is not so good: the dowry is not handed over to a watchful trustee, but is placed in the hands of the husband himself, irrevocably, just as if it were his purchase price.

The Merry Heart Goes All the Way

WHEN you come to a weariful bit of the road,
Where the stones are sharp and the path is steep,
And the back is bowed with the heft of the [illegible]
Don't stop just then for a wasteful sigh.
But challenge the worst with steadfast cheer;
If [illegible]
God's angel will hasten, your pioneer.

When you reach a lonesome bit of the road,
Curtained about with mist and murk,
And you hear faint sounds from the dread above,
[illegible]
Just laugh to scorn their doleful cries—
This is the place to whistle and sing;
Brush the fog from your fearless eyes,
And close to the faith of your fathers cling.

[illegible]
When streams are dry that in sweetness flowed,
[illegible]
Even now take heart, for, farther on,
There are hope and joy and the dawn of day;
You shall find again what you thought was gone;
'Tis the merry heart goes all the way.

A Novel Outing

THE accompanying illustration, which is the reproduction of a photograph taken by W. Halladay, Jr., Appleton, Wis., shows how a party of Christian Endeavorers from the First Congregational Society of Appleton, solved the problem of an outing at a minimum cost. As expense and time limit the [illegible] enjoy a regular vacation [illegible] planned to economize both; and a general invitation was given to join the camping party, the only qualification being membership in the Christian Endeavor. About twenty responses came. Four tents were borrowed and two large boats rented. A beautiful camping ground was found on the Fox River, within two miles of the city, so that all who were obliged to be at their place of business during the day could easily reach it without needless loss of time.

A CAMP OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS ON FOX LAKE, WISCONSIN

The camp dinner was served at seven o'clock to hearty folk whose appetites had grown apace as the day went by. Evenings were merrily spent in playing games, in a row on the river, or in building a huge bonfire, before which we roasted corn or marsh mallows. As we sat on our blankets before the embers, we told stories, sang songs; and, at last, closed the day with a service of prayer, which proved a source of much inspiration. The days of our vacation passed all too quickly; and, before breaking camp, arrangements were made for a permanent Camp Endeavor Association. The total cost for each member had not exceeded two dollars.

Massacre of the Birds

There will come a day, says a sorrowful prophet, when the world will be birdless and then the pest insects, big and little, will begin. Whether the women who use some of the 1,500,000 birds that were killed in Venezuela last year to secure feathers for hats and bonnets, ever think of this, we do not know, but they should think of it. If the craze for "tips" and "wings" that are now used for headgear keeps up, the pretty feathered creatures will be totally destroyed in this country, and in South American countries, too. Of course, this is a long look ahead, but it is nevertheless a sure outlook.

"GOD'S CHILD"

. . . A Story of Real Life, Written for "The Christian Herald," . . .

By MARY C. FRANCIS

(Concluded.)

JIM SOMERS was but insecurely balanced on the edge of his chair, and now he seemed in danger of toppling over. Instinctively he looked toward the door . . . Mr. McDonald wiped his eye glasses and sought for papers on his desk.

"JIM"

Work! Jim Somers, work!

"You know that's the only way people can have a home. Now, wouldn't you like to have a home?" pursued Hazel.

"Well, I dunno—that is, I hain't never thought about it. I never thought I was that kind."

"But you are that kind as well as anybody else. Now you see papa has a home, but he has worked for it. You are a big, strong man; wouldn't you like to do something and quit living out of doors?"

Jim Somers gazed speechlessly at her.

"Because if you would, papa needs some one in his office. Stanley Hills used to help him, but since——"

Jim started so violently that he knocked his hat to the floor. Mr. McDonald looked up quickly from his papers and a lightning-like expression passed over his face.

"Don't go," said Hazel, "I forgot that you were away then."

The old instincts of the man rallied at the suggestion, and he uttered a ready evasion.

"I've been away—yes—I—I heard, but——"

"Then you didn't believe it either," cried Hazel. "Poor Stanley! We are all his friends. Papa has never had a good boy since he left."

"I think—I'm sure I couldn't," began Jim; but Mr McDonald interrupted him.

"But I think you can. Come around to-morrow morning, and I will——"

"No, I'm much obliged, but——"

He edged nervously toward the door, but Hazel intercepted him.

"Mr. Somers, you are a brave man, and I don't like you to go on living this way. Won't you do some work for papa in his office, just to please me? Then you can sleep on the lounge in the back room, and I won't lie awake on stormy nights wondering if you're out in a snowdrift. Won't you?"

Jim Somers felt a strange, shaky sensation, and then, as though in a dream, he heard himself say, "I'll try."

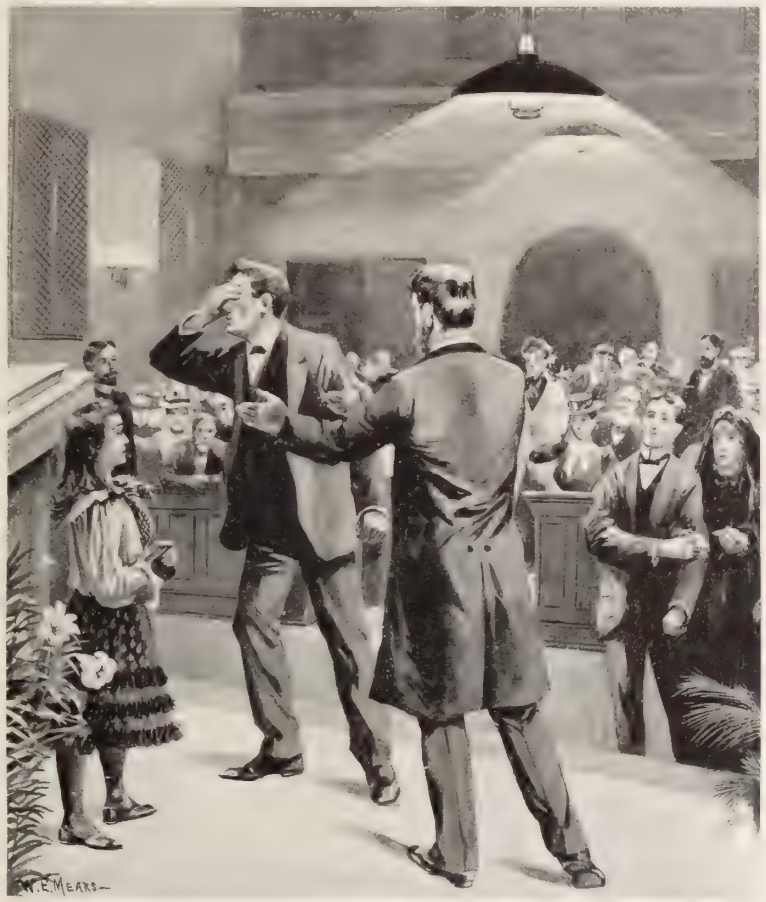
From that hour dated the revised destiny of Jim Somers. He became very useful about the office, and soon odd jobs about the house were added, and he who had never done a stroke of work in his life learned to sweep, to dust, to make fires, to chop wood, to do small chores well. He saw Hazel almost daily, either at her father's office or in their home, and the uncompromising sincerity of her code of life dawned upon his darkened mind as the morning sun might shine into a cave.

One morning an early errand took him to the lawyer's house. Hazel opened the door.

"Good-morning, Mr. Somers. Come right in. We are just going to have family worship."

Now, the words "family worship" meant about as much to Jim Somers as they would to a savage in the heart of Africa. He had never heard them before, and they signified simply something which he was willing to observe for Hazel's sake. With a mild curiosity, he followed her into the sitting-room. Here the family was grouped around Mr. McDonald, and after a cordial greeting the lawyer read aloud without comment the fourteenth chapter of St. John. When, after the reading of the Word, Hazel's sweet voice led in a hymn, Jim's eyes stared fixedly at her; and when the family knelt in prayer he sat motionless on his chair, riveted by confused astonishment. Not until Hazel took his hand and gently drew him down did he kneel, and though the words of the prayer came to him but dimly through the surging of the blood in his temples, Jim Somers was nearer the throne then than he had ever been before. After that morning a change came over him. He was more eager, more willing, more industrious than ever; yet he kept ever a peculiar aloofness, and seemed to harbor some inward thought.

One evening he sat at the table of the lawyer's family, a guest at their board. At a look from her father, Hazel bowed her head and uttered a simple grace. When she unclosed her eyes, Jim Somers looked like a man suddenly fallen ill. The veins in his neck throbbed violently. A strange hue covered his face. He barely tasted the food, and ere the meal was finished he made incoherent excuses and went hastily out.



"STOP!" CRIED JIM SOMERS, "I'M NOT FIT TO TAKE IT . . . I'M A THIEF!"

It was the first Sunday in April. Without any of the features of a tidal wave of revival, a deep and widespread religious awakening had permeated the churches. Children and young people especially had fallen under the influence, and had taken up the work with vigor. Two notable exceptions to the general example remained—Stanley Hills and Jim Somers. The former had steadfastly refused to attend the church services since the accusation made against him, declaring that he would never renew old associations until the cloud that hung over his life was removed. Jim had only said: "I ain't ready yet."

Hazel McDonald had pleaded with both of them, and to-day she was the happiest girl in Havenville, for both had promised her to attend the praise-meeting to be held that afternoon at four o'clock. Stanley, who had always dearly loved Hazel, felt, away down in his secret heart, some compunction for so long resisting the entreaties of his mother, and he had acceded with a certain inward relief. As for Jim Somers, he had listened to Hazel gravely and then had merely said: "Yes, I'll go. I reckon I'm as ready as I'll ever be."

And so a little before four o'clock on that perfect April afternoon the largest church of Havenville was rapidly filling to the limit of its capacity. Far back in a remote corner sat Jim Somers, the first time he had ever entered a church in his life; farther front sat Stanley Hills with his mother. Pulpit, platform and reading desk were banked with flowers. White lilies gleamed in snowy fragrance amid the fronds of palms and ferns, and early spring blossoms were massed in glowing array back of the organ. When, a few minutes after four, the organ pealed forth and hundreds of voices joined in the opening anthem, there was not a vacant seat in the church and many stood in the rear. Song after song followed the anthem, and then the Sunday School superintendent led in a responsive Scripture reading. A fervent prayer by the pastor followed, and after the leader of each class had risen and recited the different Scripture motto selected as the day's keynotes, the teacher of the infant class announced that several songs to be named by the children would be sung. This created a small commotion in the camp of the infants, out of which one was presently able to distinguish some half dozen popular hymns called for at once. They were sung with lusty vigor by fresh young voices, and then the pastor called Hazel McDonald to the front to receive a handsome Bible, the prize for bringing the largest number of new pupils into the Sunday School within the year. As the child, an exquisite vision in her white gown, her cheeks flushed and her eyes bright, modestly accepted the volume, a low murmur of approval rolled up.

"And now," concluded Mr. West, "before the fifty honor cards are distributed, what we have determined shall be a surprise gift of which no one has known in advance will be given. Since Hazel has done so much for us within the past year, I am sure that anyone will be proud to receive from her a token, and she may therefore give to anyone whom she may choose this Testament. Select the one whom you wish to have it, Hazel."

A murmur of excitement arose. For a moment Hazel stood looking carefully over the audience, and then she said clearly: "Will Mr. Somers please come forward?" Those sitting by Jim Somers saw him lean forward and gasp for breath, but he did not rise. Hazel repeated her request: "Mr. Somers, please come forward."

But above and beyond the child's sweet tones he could hear another voice calling as loudly as the judgment trump: "Now! Now! Now!" and with that dread summons thundering in his ears he got up and walked down the aisle with hastening steps to the flower-crowned altar where Hazel stood among the lilies. As he approached she came toward him and held out the Book to address him, but scarcely had she pronounced his name when he threw out one arm with such a gesture as a drowning man might use: "Stop," he said, "I'm not fit to take it. I stole that money from Mr. Bradley." He turned toward the audience and lifted up his voice: "Do you hear me? I'm a thief, not Stanley Hills, and I don't ask to be forgiven; but I want to tell you about it, and then I want to be arrested and go to jail, and after that I'll start over again and be a decent man yet. I didn't steal that money for any particular reason, except that Mr. Bradley put me out of his store once when I was drunk, and I had a sort of a grudge against him. So I hid behind some barrels after climbing in the alley window and took the money while they watched the runaway. That night I sneaked out of town on a freight train, and it was six weeks before I got back and found out that Stanley had been arrested for it. I felt mighty bad, but I didn't see what I could do; for I didn't feel then like I do now. A good many of you have been kind to me this winter, but she"—he pointed to Hazel with a shaking hand—"she is the first one that ever made me ashamed of myself. I run into the house the night of the fire because I remembered she was the pretty little girl I had seen walking along the streets, and then she sent for me and asked me to go to work and sleep in a bed. Say, I expect none of you know how a man feels to be in a warm bed on a cold night for the first time in his life. It's queer, but of course you can't understand that. Anyhow, I began to feel different, and then she made me kneel down one morning at family worship, and one evening she said a little prayer at the table, and—and——"

He stopped abruptly, his broad chest heaving. "I can't tell you all of it," he went on, "but I'm glad it's over now. I knew it was coming, but I didn't think it would happen this way. I thought at first I would save up my money until I could pay it all up; but it's no use. Here's $12, Mr. Bradley, and I'll go with the marshal now and pay you the rest when I get out. I wish I'd known better sooner."

He leaned against the pulpit and buried his head among the lilies. They were crowding about him; the pastor, Stanley, Mr. Bradley, Mr. McDonald, each striving to take his hand first. Mrs. Hills drew Hazel into her arms and wept tearsof joy.

Stanley Hills drew the sobbing man's hand within his own, saying: "There, Jim, it's all right now." Bradley looked the picture of a man dumbfounded, and he said to Stanley, brokenly: "I beg of you to forgive me. I made an awful mistake."

The pastor realized that no programme could be continued and intervened to end a scene that had aroused the deepest emotions in the congregation. "We will all forgive and forget," he said. "Mr. Somers will now accept the Testament presented on behalf of the Sunday School by Hazel McDonald, after which we will sing 'God Be With Us Till We Meet Again,' and be dismissed with the benediction. May God bless our brother and make us all as ready to confess our sins as he is. This praise meeting will be continued at seven-thirty this evening."

As Hazel pressed the book into Jim Somers' hand he said: "You are God's child, and by his grace I will be one, too."

That was years ago. Mr. James Somers is to-day one of the pillars of the Havenville Church. Stanley Hills is a successful lawyer, and is cautious about circumstantial evidence.

THE END

. . . The Saloon-Keeper's Gift . . .

An Array of Correspondents Who Give Reasons Why the Church Should Accept It

IN this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we present the letters to those who reply affirmatively to J. R. N.'s now [illegible] whether a church is justified in accepting a gift of money from a saloon-keeper in aid of its missionary and other spiritual work. These letters constitute the strongest argument that has yet been written in the saloon-keeper's behalf. Next week, the page will be devoted exclusively to the other side—the negatives, and our friends who hold the opinion that the gift should be rejected, will then have the field. The discussion is far-reaching and deep-searching, and we commend it to the thoughtful reading of all who are interested in church work.

Wm. B. Engel, Minneapolis, writes:

A saloon-keeper's money is [illegible] much as any other merchant's money, be he a shoemaker, tailor, dry goods merchant, or [illegible] is earned legitimately and honestly, and by that we understand that value is given for it, there is not a doubt in my mind as to the advisability of receiving it. In this great and greedy age there is too much cheating done in all businesses, and to my way of thinking, in God's eyes the dollar which is stolen from the customer by misrepresenting an article is just as unwelcome in God's treasury as the dollar which this conscientious inquirer seems to think is unwelcome from the saloon-keeper.

F. J. Eland, Lafayette, N. J., writes:

Should a neighbor offer my child food, would I not thank them for their kindness; but if my child, being hungry, should ask a neighbor for food, would I not be justly indignant at the aspersion cast upon me by my child in applying to one upon whom it had no claim rather than to the one whose duty it was to care for it? Does not my parable explain the difference between our asking support for our Father's work from those who are not his, and the acceptance of what may be voluntarily offered, and devoting it to a higher service than it would otherwise have?

O. C. Newsom, Danville, Ind., writes:

Take the money. Suppose we should refuse it. To be consistent we would have to refuse all money gotten in a wicked way. We would refuse money made on the Sabbath. In one swoop that would leave out all who own railroad stock, or any business that runs unnecessarily seven days in the week. We would have to refuse all money obtained by usury. This would include the bankers, corporations and merchants, great and small, and many of the preachers.

S. D. Goungerich, Amish, Ia., writes:

Mission and benevolent work must have financial support from some source, and may not always be from persons and enterprises wholly unquestionable. Therefore, in our modest opinion, we would not hesitate to accept a free offering from a saloon-keeper or any other enterprise of a similar character, to be used for the promotion of God's work.

Mary Bowen, Gideon, Kans., writes:

We should be Christ-like. It was a sinner who anointed Christ's feet, and he accepted it. It seems to me it would be wrong not to take it.

W. C. Miller, Puyallup, Wash., writes:

In the Bible we read, "The silver is mine, the gold is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills." Now, if the gold and silver belong to God, it seems to me it should be used to his glory. The manner in which it is obtained by man cannot defile the metal, but may defile the one who gets it. In the case of the saloon-keeper, he surely is defiled by his occupation; but the church that receives his money, has an opportunity to put the same to a better use than he is likely to do if the money be refused.

Mrs. S. S. Sponsler, Supt. of Sabbath Observance and Treasurer of W. C. T. U., Unionville, Cal., writes:

Yes, use it, just as long as men belonging to the church (I won't say Christians) vote for the saloon. Which is entitled to the most respect, the saloon-keeper who sells whiskey according to the law, or the church member who by his vote makes it lawful for him to sell it?

Alfred Morton, Birtle, Man., writes:

If the saloon-keeper or any other sinner offers his contribution willingly, without having been asked for it, let it be received with thanksgiving. At the same time remind the person that his offering will not avail to purchase his salvation. On the other hand, let neither saloon-keeper nor any other sinner who refuses to surrender his heart to Jesus be asked for a cent. There is abundance in the hands of God's children, if consecrated. As long as ungodly people in the congregation are looked to for support of God's work, there will always be more or less of a tendency for the preacher to shun what Paul in Acts 20: 27, says he did not shun.

James Doran, Custer, S. D., writes:

Yes, take all the money you can get from that source. It will be turning it into a good channel; and, better still, if by using the right means you can take in all the saloon-keepers and others connected with the business, it would be a good thing for many and a hurt to none.

L. H. DeWolf, Kinsman, O., writes:

Yes, accept all his offers, believing it would be better invested than in a branch saloon. As well might you refuse all money furnished by the government, for it is receiving an enormous revenue from the sale of intoxicants.

D. W. Hess, Pleasant Lake, Ind., writes:

Nothing can be more absurd than thinking that money can be tainted. The acceptance of money from a saloon-keeper is equivalent to that much labor expended by him for Christ, whether he be a Christian or not, and it is immaterial as to his mode of getting it. Some may say: "It fosters dishonesty to accept money from a dishonest source." It does in certain cases, but this money which you accept from a saloon-keeper is used to help break up his own business.

Zoe Mackay, Pictou, Nova Scotia, writes:

South of me a rum distillery is operated by a wind-mill—and the wind is from the south. North of me is a printing establishment publishing Bibles—and the wind that is the motor power of the distillery goes untarnished to drive the Bible printing-press. Money is a primary motor in the world to move things along, and, like the wind, goes untarnished per se from one operation to another. Let it therefore come from the saloon to the Christian Church, and the more the better, and when it all comes from all evil sources, the church will lengthen and broaden and heighten until there is no room for the saloon or any kindred foe of God amid the human family.

Mrs. Hattie L. Ford, Lambertville, Mich., writes:

The wisest course would be to take the money when offered, and pray that the man might be just as willing to give his heart to the Lord as he was his money.

F. Maes, Raton, N. Mex., writes:

If money is and always has been an absolute necessity for humanity, then it must have been instituted by God. If God instituted it, it must have been for the purpose of doing good. What if some take it for the [illegible] take it from its abuse and put it into good use.

Z. Thomas, Richmond, Ind., writes:

Accept it cordially and praise him so affectionately that he will feel that one word of praise is worth more than a thousand words of condemnation.

J. W. Burgin, Suttor, Vt., writes:

The use to which money has been put in the past has not in the least affected the character of the money; the use which shall be made of it in the future will not affect its character; therefore money is not affected by the use which is made of it. My knowledge that [illegible] its commercial value (and that is all the value it has), for it merely pays for material and [illegible] would accept the money offered the cause of missions by the saloonist, and pray God to make the wrath of man to praise him by directing the disburser of it how to use it wisely.

Rev. B. B. Royer, Chicago, Ill., writes:

Yes, accept his gift, especially if it is made in the spirit in which such gifts are usually made. Is not all the wealth—the silver and [illegible] time? If then a few men put it to an evil use, shall there never be an attempt to redeem a portion or all of it? Shall it be allowed to remain in hands where it can do only harm, or shall it, when offered, be put to holy use where it can do only good? By all means the latter. What if this gift does represent bread taken out of the mouths of hungry children, shall the church refuse it and thus permit it to accomplish [illegible] hungry and clothing from the almost naked, or shall the church accept it and thus lessen the power of the saloon, to work its evil among men? By all means the latter. But if the church must not accept the saloon-keeper's gift of $100, what shall the church do when the saloon-keeper offers his saloon—which is only a larger gift—and one that has been acquired in the same way that the $100 was acquired? Far better take it, fill it with chairs, erect a platform at one end, on which the story of the Cross may be daily told, than to allow it to go on in its work of soul destruction.

P. S., Wisconsin, writes:

The first gift from a saloon-keeper should be accepted by the Christian Church, provided he is told that Divine blessing will be asked on it, and that no more money will be accepted as long as he is a keeper of a saloon. This done in a Christ-like manner, the good cause will be strengthened.

G. T. Belvin, Severn, Va., writes:

If the saloon-keeper will give freely, the Lord will accept of free gifts from even the vilest sinner. His gifts will cause him to stop and consider how he is living.

O. F. Ebert, Milwaukee, Minn., writes:

Any saloon-keeper following and observing the moral, social or police restrictions of his profession, and not accommodating minors, drunkards or spendthrifts, ought to be admitted as a normal giver, just as well as any honest druggist, dry goods man, groceryman or banker. To the pure, the Scripture says, everything is pure; that is the golden rule for a Christian heart and conscience. Christ says: "Do not judge, do not condemn." Better too liberal than too bigoted.

A. M. Wilder, Yellow Springs, Ohio, writes:

An honest, well-to-do farmer sold his grain to the merchant without knowing where it [illegible] the distiller, and the distiller sold the whiskey to the saloon-keeper, and the saloon-keeper [illegible] distiller did the same, the commission merchant, and, last of all, came the well-to-do farmer, who turned in the tenth of his income. [illegible] tributed of their substance to the church? I say take each one's contribution and be sure and make good use of it by consecrating it to the use of the church, and good will follow.

Thos. K. Knollin, Syracuse, N. Y., writes:

You have heard the story of the old lady who prayed for bread and some boys heard her and dropped a loaf down the chimney, and while the old lady was thanking the Lord for [illegible] door and told her that they had dropped it themselves. The old lady replied: "The Lord sent it if the devil brought it." So I would say in regard to the said question.

E. Mitchell, Roseville, Ill., writes:

Judging from the quantity of intoxicants used, it would be hard to find a dollar five years in circulation from the mints, that had not been used in the liquor traffic; so if one chanced to get into the treasury of the Lord I would bid it welcome, with the hope that its future would bless rather than curse mankind.

A. L. Harvey, Caseville, Mich., writes:

In regard to receiving a gift, the recipient is responsible only for the use he makes of what has been intrusted to him. If money is donated to the church by the saloon, the church will be held responsible for the use made of the money; it cannot be held responsible for the manner in which the money has been acquired. If the church uses saloon donations for Christian purposes it is doing right, because it is making for the welfare of the community at large.

D. W. McDonald, Molesworth, Ont., writes:

If a saloon-keeper is disposed to give to God's cause in any way, it should be accepted. "The gold and silver are the Lord's" (Hag. 2: 8; Ps. 50: 10, and also Jas. 5: 3). We read in Exod. 3: 22, and 12: 35-36, that the children of Israel (God's people) were commanded to borrow gold and silver and raiment from the Egyptians (sinners), and spoiled them.

M. V. B. P. writes:

If a church honestly obtains a dollar from a saloon-keeper, a profane man, a libertine, an over-exacting millionaire, or anybody, no matter what the motives of the man who gives it, its true religious service begins when the church sets it apart with prayer. The origin of Christian money is of no more account than the origin of a Christian man; both may have been in the service of sin.

Dr. O. B. Bird, Ocean Grove, N. J., writes:

I [illegible] unless it is an out-and-out prohibition church. Saloons are licensed by a party for which a majority of church members vote. For them therefore to hold up Pharisaical hands in mock horror over the source of the money, is to be inconsistent in the highest degree. Let them take the money, and be glad if by its use they can wipe out one per cent. of the shame which attaches to the fact that some of their members voted for that very saloon!

J. H. Massey, Port Walthall, Va., writes:

I have been a member of a Christian church more than fifty years, most of the time an official member, and I have always gotten every dollar I could from saloons and turned it to building up the cause of God, thereby financially weakening Satan's kingdom and strengthening the kingdom of God.

The Sultan's Government Upholds the Lawless Koords—Terrorism at Erzroom

IN a letter just received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Anatolia, an ominous state of affairs is pictured by the writer, a faithful missionary. He says:

"We have under our care more than 1,100 orphans. Of these about 200 are in the Province of Diarbekir. The Germans are caring for an equal number. Last February the Governor-General of the province closed our orphan homes in Choonkoosh and Palu, and he did the same for the Germans in Palu and in the city of Diarbekir itself, while for some unexplained reason he left our orphans in Diarbekir city undisturbed. The affair was at once reported to Constantinople, and our Minister (Mr. Straus) and the British Ambassador took the matter up in earnest, and they secured a definite promise from the Porte that these refuges should be re-opened without delay. Up to the present time they remain closed, and the Governor says that he has received no order to open them! The matter has been referred to the capital again, and we await the result. It is very clear that the government does not wish orphans to be under the care of foreigners; they prefer that they should roam the streets. If there were no foreign political protection, all these homes would be speedily closed, and missionary schools along with them.

"One of the much-suffering districts which belong to this missionary field is Geghi, in the Province of Erzroom. We have some forty or fifty orphans under our care here from that district. Just before sitting down to write this I received a letter from a reliable person there, who speaks of a murder that has been committed there. The chief Armenian in the village of Temran, a man of remarkably kind heart, was asleep with his family, when his house was entered by five armed men. His wife and mother were severely beaten, and he was killed, although he pleaded for his life. My correspondent says that the government has done next to nothing toward the arrest and punishment of the criminals; consequently the whole district is under a reign of terror. The letter says that death is preferable to the present condition, for there is a famine as well as fear.

"An honest and intelligent Turkish official said to me the other day that there is no assurance of security in any part of the Empire, and that there cannot be under the present policy of lenient dealing with criminals. The only pretence of punishment after the massacres was the arrest and imprisonment of Armenians, who were charged with inciting the Turks and Koords! The lawless element has now become very daring, and nothing short of condign punishment for grave offences can restore confidence to any part of the country. In the place of this the government continues to increase the regiments of Hamidieh Koords; and thus, as my Turkish friend said the other day, 'putting into the hands of these lawless men Mauser rifles instead of the matchlocks with which they have been accustomed to resist us.' Thus it is easy to see that the political outlook is gloomy. This condition, very naturally exerts a very depressing influence upon the evangelistic work. Pray for us."

Rev. Mr. Dewey, of the American Mission at Mardin, writes:

Editor "The Christian Herald":

I am in receipt of your favor of June 17, with check for $100, toward the support of the orphans. Our sincerest thanks to you and the friends of humanity you represent.

Last week examination of the school for boys took place. The bright, animated faces of the forty boys, each eager to show his proficiency, was a pleasant sight, and in striking contrast with the appearance many of them presented when they first came—dirty, ragged, with tangled hair, and a dull, listless look, or perhaps the scared, fearful expression of a hunted animal. These forty lads, I must explain, are the lower grades, from those just beginning the Alif, Ba, Ta (the Arabic A, B, C) to those who can read with some fluency and have begun arithmetic and geography. The more advanced (some fifteen in number) are in the high school or the preparatory department.

Faith and Unbelief.

In early days (says Mr. Moody) men wore a signet ring, with their initials, and instead of signing their names, they used to take the ring and seal the document. That was setting to their seal; that was an indorsement. And now God comes down into this unbelieving world, and says, "Who will set to his seal that I am true?" Will you set to your seal that God is true? Better for us to make ourselves liars and God true than to try and make ourselves out true and God a liar. That is what many men do. Will you set to your seal that God is true? Unbelief says, "I won't." Faith says, "I will." O, may God help you now to say, "I will do so;" and the moment you do that, and put your faith in God, then comes peace and happiness to you.

The Relief of Leyden

After Enduring Siege and Famine They Were Wondrously Delivered

"IT was in 1574," writes Rev. E. P. Hammond in his latest book, entitled 'Roger's Travels,' "that the Spanish forces, led by Vasdez, held the town in siege for four months. During all that time the inhabitants of Leyden resisted these cruel invaders. At last, when summoned to surrender, Vanderdoes sent back word that when provisions failed they would devour their left hands, reserving their right hands to defend their rights and liberties. They were forced to eat all the cats and dogs to keep from starving. And, according to Motley, green leaves were stripped from the trees and shrubs, and every herb was used for food, but even then many died of starvation. Mothers dropped dead in the streets, with their infants in their arms; while in many houses the watchmen on their rounds found whole families—father, mother and children—dead, for a dreadful plague went hand in hand with the famine.

"The inhabitants fell like grass beneath the scythe. Motley says that 'from six to eight thousand sunk beneath this scourge alone, and yet the people held out,' men and women mutually encouraging each other to prevent the entrance of their enemies, as being far more horrible than pestilence or famine. Some of the more faint-hearted were anxious to surrender. While Adrian Vanderwerf (the Burgomaster) passed through the streets crowds gathered around him, and there he stood on yonder spot, tall, with haggard visage, yet beautiful and commanding, and, as he waved his broad felt hat for silence, in a loud voice he said, 'My friends, why do you murmur that we do not forget our vows and surrender the city to the Spaniards? I have vowed to keep the city. I can die but once, whether by your hands, the enemies, or the hand of God. My own fate is indifferent to me, not that of the city intrusted to me. I know we shall starve if not soon relieved, but I would rather starve than die a dishonorable death. Your threats do not affect me. Take my life, if you will: here is my sword, plunge it into my heart, and divide my flesh among you to satisfy your hunger; but surrender I will not so long as I live.' With these bold words he touched the hearts of the people, and they shouted to the enemy when they returned to the battlements of the city, 'You call us rat-eaters and dog-eaters; and it is true. So long as you hear the dog bark and the cat mew within the walls you may know that the city holds out, and when all our resources are exhausted we will set fire to the city, and perish with the women and children in the flames rather than suffer our liberties to be crushed.'

"The Spaniards shouted in reply, 'As well could the Prince of Orange pluck the stars from the sky as bring the ocean to Leyden to their relief.' But they little knew that God was fighting against them, and that he could and would do this, as we shall soon see.

"Finally, a carrier pigeon flew over the heads of their enemies, and brought the glad news that the Prince of Orange was coming, with two hundred boats, loaded with provisions, that he had cut his way through the dykes, and, as Leyden was lower than the ocean, they would soon be floated to the gates of the city. But the water did not rise high enough. Away in the distance, beyond the walls, they saw bread and food in abundance, but this only maddened the starving multitude. Many cried to the Lord for help, and their prayers were answered. A wind rose; a storm from the ocean drove the water faster and faster through the broken dykes; on and on it rushed till it reached the haughty Spaniards and drowned many of them in an unexpected moment. The flotilla of boats glided over them and carried food to the hungry people."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Methods of Modern Missions*

OUR first impression is that these are far more numerous than those made use of by the apostles. Five great agencies are usually enumerated: the evangelistic, the educational, the literary, the medical and the industrial. Besides, there are, as Dr. Lawrence suggests (Modern Missions in the East, chapter 7), several other activities demanding much time and labor on the part of the missionary; such as teaching converts to sing, superintending the erection of mission buildings—schoolhouses, chapels, dispensaries, keeping accounts, purchasing and forwarding supplies, advising the native Christians in a great variety of matters, and advocating and furthering various social and political reforms. In defence of these apparently more varied activities, it might be pleaded, first, that the apostles themselves were inclined to be tolerant in the matter of methods. Ready to condemn unsparingly any who adulterated the Gospel, they were ready, also, to admit a large variety in the methods of applying the Gospel to the needs of men.

It is a joy to be able to say, and that without fear of successful contradiction, that in modern, as in apostolic missionary practice, the method most emphasized is the preaching of the Gospel. To this method more time and strength are given than to any other, if, indeed, we may not say, than to all others combined. It is true that this fact is not always apparent to the casual observer. The apparatus employed in preaching may be, often is, less noticeable than that required for education, or literary work, or medical missions. Education means school buildings, sometimes of an imposing sort; medical work requires hospitals and dispensaries; literary work involves pressrooms, it may be, or Bible Houses. Preaching may or may not presuppose chapels. If it does, these will often not be distinguishable from the structures that surround them, whether shops in the city or cottages in the country. The only real essentials for preaching are a preacher and an audience.

But let no one suppose that the preaching of missionaries is confined to the Sabbath and to stated places. Of them, as truly as of the first Christians, may it be said that they "go everywhere preaching the word," and that they claim all times and places for delivering their message. "You will not near the mark," writes a Chinese missionary, "if you imagine the Gospel missionary in a straw hat and a pea-jacket, sitting on a broken wall—there is always a broken wall handy in a village—or on a door-step, or on a form at the front of an eating-house, conversing freely with a score of Chinamen, all of whom, perhaps, bear some mark of their occupation, while a number of boys in very scant clothing thrust themselves to the front, and a few women linger at a distance, just beyond the range of hearing." The picture would be equally true of missionary preaching in any of the great missionary lands. The present writer has heard the Gospel proclaimed in native chapels, in heathen temples, in the homes of the common people, on the veranda of the missionary's house, in the ward of the mission hospital, in the market-place, at the boat-landing, by the camp-fire in the jungle, in the hovel of the outcast, in the halls of princes, and the palace of a king.

And how many are the means of locomotion which missionaries adopt as they thus go forth to sow beside all waters! By train or steamboat, where they can, as sometimes in India and China and Japan; by jinriksha, by ox-cart, by mule litter, by wheelbarrow, by sedan-chair, by bicycle; slung in a hammock on a pole, as Hannington was in Africa; mounted on horses, or mules, or elephants, or camels, or astride an ox, as Livingstone made his first journeys; by boats, propelled sometimes by steam, more often by sails, or oars, or poles, or tracked by ropes by power of man or beast; by canoe and dog-sled and snowshoe, as Young in the icy North; oftenest of all on foot, trudging with Gilmour across the dreary plains of Mongolia, floundering with Livingstone through the hopeless swamps, threading with Paton the jungle paths of New Hebrides, clambering with Mackay over the mountain tracks of Formosa, toiling with McGilvary up the beds of the brooks that come down from the haunts of the shy Moo Surs—so the heralds of the cross go forth to tell their story.

Gideon's Band

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Sept. 24. Judges 7: 1-23

GLOOMY indeed was the situation of the people, when Gideon's band went out on its desperate mission. Living in a time of peace and security, it is difficult for us to realize how miserable these people were. Their enemies were warlike and pitiless. They came down on the land like a swarm of locusts, destroying all before them, that they were unable to carry away. After a man had tilled his land and sowed his seed and gathered the harvest, the enemy appeared and took from him the fruits of his labor. He was fortunate if he had notice of their coming, in time to make his escape to some cave in the mountains, where he might hide until the enemy had gone away. Those who could not do so paid the penalty of their lives. For seven long years these marauders ravaged the country, and there was no defence or redress. The people were panic stricken and made no resistance. Yet they might have defended their homes. When Gideon raised the standard, there were thirty thousand men ready to march, and no people fighting in their own land need despair with such a force. But there was apparently no organization and there was no leader. Evil forces in a city or a State often triumph to this day for the same reason. The Lord's people do not unite to resist the enemy.

This was to be the Lord's own deliverance. The people had done nohitng to help themselves; now God would show his power. And first of all he provided a leader. All that God does for men he does through men. He does not interfere directly but he commissions a man to do the work. So Gideon was chosen, and, as it had been with Moses, there was some difficulty in getting him to accept the charge. He was modest and diffident. The Lord's instruments are not the loud-spoken, self-appointed leaders. They are men who distrust themselves and are without ambition. Gideon was slow to believe that so obscure a man as he, could be the appointed agent of national deliverance. But the call had its effect upon him. It stirred him up to a work of purification. During the period of religious declension in Israel, an altar had been erected on his father's land to Baal the Canaanitish deity. Gideon went in the night and overturned it. That was a good beginning for a career of deliverance. Those who are to fight the Lord's battles ought to have no altar to a false god near them. No man can preach as he ought, or effectively lead a movement for moral reform if he is not true to God in his heart and home. As the event proved, this service involved as great personal danger to Gideon, as did the subsequent conflict with the Midianites. It required as much courage, if not more, for it was the anger of his father's household and of the men of his own city that he must defy. There are many men who have courage for public movements who are cowards at home. But Gideon began where he ought to begin, and when he had rid his own home of idols he was ready for the larger duty.

Here was a man with the courage of his convictions—a man who inspired respect among friends and enemies. The leader so much needed in the country's exigency had appeared. So, when the Midianites came on their customary raid to take away the harvest, there was a man to meet them. It is worthy of notice that the first men to rally to Gideon's support, were the men of his own city, who not long before, had been eager to lynch him for overthrowing the altar of Baal. Others came from a distance, until there were thirty thousand men under his orders. Then comes the strange story of weeding out the army, to bring it down to three hundred men. The lesson the nation needed to learn was not one of army tactics, but of fidelity to God and reliance upon him. If they had conquered in a pitched battle, they might have returned to boast of their prowess and to depend on themselves in future. Three hundred men, strangely equipped, in one hand with a horn, and in the other a pitcher containing a torch, march out in the night to the place where the huge army lay encamped. We can imagine how this horde of men, coming as on a pleasure excursion to seize booty, and having the experience of seven years to guide them, must have felt, when in the silence and darkness, they were awakened by the crash of the breaking of the pitchers, and saw the lights around the camp, and heard the blowing of the horns. The panic and the stampede were inevitable. Their very numbers added to the confusion. The rout was complete, and the Israelites had easy work in driving the survivors out of the country. So it has been again and again in the world's history. It is not with numbers that great things have been done. One consecrated man, a Luther, a Knox, a Cromwell, at the head of a small band, has won the victory, for Christ and righteousness.

DON'T HURT SOME

But Coffee Certainly Ruins Some of the Most Highly Organized People

"One year I lived where the water was bitter with iron and I could not bear to drink it, so I began drinking coffee three times a day.

"Gradually I noticed an uncomfortable feeling in the stomach, and more or less constipation. In a few months I began to lie awake at night long after I had retired.

"This increased, until I never thought of going to sleep before three or four o'clock in the morning, and then only after getting out of bed and walking the floor for an hour.

"I was talking of my nervous state with a friend, who suggested that perhaps it was the coffee I had been using. She felt quite sure it was, and stated that coffee would not stay on her stomach at all, but as she felt she must have a hot drink for breakfast, she had been using Postum Food Coffee. She said she didn't like Postum particularly well, and at breakfast the next morning I didn't wonder, when I tasted the flat drink that the servant brought on.

"The same day I was invited to take dinner with another friend, Mrs. Foster. I had visited her often before and knew she made delicious coffee, so when she asked how I liked her coffee, said, 'It is just as fine as usual.' She invited me to have another cup, but I said, 'I would not dare to take the second.' 'Oh, you can drink as many cups of this as you like; it won't hurt you. This is Postum Food Coffee. We have been using it a year now, and the little children have all they want, and our family have never been as healthy as in the past year.' 'Postum,' said I, doubtfully, 'why, the Postum I had this morning didn't taste any more like this than dishwater.' 'Perhaps it was not made right,' said my friend. 'I have known more than one person to be turned away from Postum because it was poorly made. There is no secret in it; only allow it to boil long enough to bring out the taste, and there you are.' I have been using Postum since, and am entirely cured of my trouble. I cannot say too much for it."—Grace A. Foster, Omaha, Neb.

This is not faith nor theory, it is an accomplished fact attested to by thousands. This instrument cures all forms of disease, no patent or chrome, in Nature's own manner, by placing the body in a condition that assists in the absorption of oxygen, the great vitalizing force of this element is diffused throughout the system and disease is conquered. It simply cannot exist in an organization that appropriates oxygen in large quantities. The OXYDONOR is small, compact, and by merely applying it during sleep, a complete cure is effected.

Send for our book "GRATEFUL REPORTS," containing hundreds of letters from clergymen, lawyers, business-men, etc., etc., who have been cured.

REV. THOS. J. OLIVER CURRAN, St. George's Church, 76th St. & Drexel Ave., Chicago, Ill., July 8th, 1899, writes:

"I have used the OXYDONOR on myself for Catarrh, Colds, Nervousness and Sleeplessness and found it to work like magic.

"I am positive from what I know it has done for myself and others, that it will do all you claim."

Yours sincerely, THOS. J. OLIVER CURRAN,
(In charge of St. George's Mission)

CAUTION! Imitations of OXYDONOR are dangerous to use. Refuse to accept them. Dr. Sanche is the inventor and originator, and has obtained final decision in Supreme Court in Washington, D. C., against imitators. We are operating under the ONLY PATENTS that have been granted on THIS PROCESS and THESE INSTRUMENTS. Nothing can be gained or saved by purchasing spurious articles.

Send for prices. Our productions are selling rapidly in this country. We want persons in all sections to sell for us. Many giving only part of their time are making $100 to $200 per month. Others giving all their time are making much more.

A Rural Conflagration—Mosquitoes and Malaria

WE were just rising from our late dinner, and lingered a moment or two to watch the golden sunset from our great bay window, a sunset among the mountains, flooding the sky with such light as makes the pavements of the New Jerusalem. Suddenly Ahasuerus started, and exclaimed, and Jonathan at the same instant almost shouted, "Fire! Fire!" and both men rushed out of the house as if they had been shot from a cannon's mouth, and went tearing down the road on their bicycles like meteors from the sky. We women watching saw, a quarter of a mile off, a red glow, rising from a grove, which marked the stately home of a neighbor, and Alice cried pitifully:

"It's at the Simmons'; either the new barn, or the house, I'm not sure which. Oh, I hope they'll get the horses out safely."

"That barn is full of new hay," said Martha Jane, "and I have my doubts as to whether it was properly cured. People often have blazing barns, because they are in too great a hurry to pack in their hay before it has been dried and seasoned by the sun and wind."

"While there are so many careless men around with pipes, and cigars, and cigarettes, and while persons will throw matches down anywhere, under the impression that they are burnt out, when half the time they are still smouldering, you do not need to seek a reason for fires in spontaneous combustion." I said this firmly, but modestly, and nobody answered me, for by this time the fire had made great progress: from a blush of rose color between the trees it had rapidly increased until it was a great sheaf of orange, and yellow, and red, leaping upward, and throwing its splendid illumination far and wide on the dusk of the summer night.

"Let us go to the fire!" said Alice.

WE went, and found our neighbors there before us. There was nothing to do except to let the beautiful spacious barn burn to the ground. But willing hands had taken out the wagons and harnesses, the phaeton, the surrey, and the big carryall, the saddles, and the bridles; and the horses, wild with fright, had been calmed and led off to a secure place in the stalls of a church near by. The men of the country-side were bravely and efficiently working to save the other buildings, and as they kept the roof of adjacent barns covered and wet, and passed buckets from hand to hand, they were in righting trim, and looked able to cope with even this relentless element. Women stood, or sat in groups on the broad verandas, and everybody sympathized with the neighbors in their calamity: everybody found a word of cheer to say; everybody was relieved to know that the insurance was all right, and happy that the stock was rescued, and thankful that there had been a heavy rain the day before, and that there was absolutely no wind, not a puff, not a zephyr, and, most of all, that twilight, not midnight was the hour of the fire. It was a beautiful exhibition of good comradeship and neighborly kindness, and it revealed what a heart of love beats in a country neighborhood, binding by its tender cords the whole community together, as in one bundle.

MOSQUITOES now have another sin laid to their account. They have always been very objectionable, and have never had any friends. Who can tolerate a mosquito? The sly, still kind which makes its presence known by its offensive settling on your cheek, and drawing the blood, is a shade more irritating than the noisy, hummy kind which hovers round you singing, "Here I come!" Both are utterly and abominably indecorous and thoroughly disagreeable, and as we are informed by the doctors, that the little pests fly about transmitting typhoid infection and malaria, we have less than ever any use to attribute to them. Bad cess to every mosquito! In Florida about this time they float about in clouds, so that one runs the gauntlet, covered with veils, and muffled over ears and chin, and neck, or one breathes them, and chokes: and they kill the chickens, settling on the poor frantic things, and biting them till their feathers drop off, and they die.

The flies too, are among the torments of this mortal life, and we could well do without them. Screens in doors, screens in windows, screens over dishes, screens over kitchen tables, and thus only may you bid flies defiance. They are scavengers which deposit the dirt they collect on food for your tables, and on your dainty dress. No good housekeeper can abide flies, nor should they be permitted to enter a house, in bedroom or parlor or kitchen. A fly is a nuisance, and while mosquito bars or wire netting can be had nobody should suffer martyrdom on their account or through their depredations. I have visions as I write of farmhouse ceilings black with these creatures roosting overhead at night, of dreadful meals eaten as it on the field of battle with flies dropping into coffee cups and glasses of milk, and boldly disputing for every morsel of bread.

Still, I am not in favor of sticky paper laid about, to entrap these little marauders, imprisoning them by their hapless feet, and holding them in helpless misery until death relieves them. I would not torture any living thing. Far better keep them out of doors, or kill them at once if they cannot be driven out, by one merciful and energetic blow, than to exterminate them by fly-papers, especially of the sticky variety.

"Every well man hath his ill day." Hood's Sarsaparilla purifies, vitalizes and enriches the blood. It cures you when "a bit off" or when seriously afflicted. You should take Hood's.

Won't You Trust Him?

CHRIST is now a mighty Saviour;
In our guilty place he stood,
Met the full demands of justice—
Paid our ransom-price with blood.

CHORUS:
Won't you trust him? Won't you trust him?
Won't you trust the Christ who died?
Won't you trust the loving Saviour,
Who God's justice satisfied?

When he saw us sunk in ruin,
To our rescue swift he came,
Trod the wine-press of God's anger,
Bore man's bitter scorn and shame.

Hear to-day his sweet voice calling
Weary souls with sin oppressed;
Hasten to him, sinner, hasten;
He will give you peace and rest.

Though your sins be red like crimson,
If you only to him go,
In his blood you'll find there's cleansing
That will make them white as snow.

You Don't Need Medicine

to dose, deluge and finally derange your stomach. Ten to one if it cures your trouble, the drugs you have taken will bring on another hardly less serious. Why jump from the frying-pan into the fire?

The Electropoise will cure most diseases without medicine, by simply placing the body in condition to receive oxygen enough to purify and keep in health. We say "most diseases," for the Electropoise will not cure everything; but where it fails to cure it will afford relief that you would not knowingly go without.

The Electropoise makes well and keeps well, prevents as well as cures—used once a day will keep the doctor away.

A DOCTOR WRITES:

"Without a doubt the Electropoise has the gift and power to cure multitudes who without it must surely die, and that, too, in early life, or in the very maturity of strength when their untimely death is most difficult of solution." C. COLEGROVE, M.D., Holland, N. Y.

A WISE INVESTMENT.

Greensburg, Pa., April 20, 1899.—I have used an Electropoise for four years. I am confident that during that time it has saved me $300 in drugs and doctor's bills. Yours gratefully, JOHN B. BOTT, C.E.

REV. GILBERT C. MOULSDALE, LL.D., WRITES FROM BOONTON, N. J., UNDER DATE OF MARCH 27th, 1899:

"I can bear witness to the curative effects of Electropoise. In December of 1895 I was threatened with complete nervous prostration and was also troubled with Insomnia and Dyspepsia. My case was so serious that some of my friends advised me to quit preaching, at least for a year. I consulted several physicians, one of them an eminent specialist; but nothing seemed to help me. At the time I was suffering most, a friend came to hold services for me and urged me to try the Electropoise, which I did. From that time I ceased taking hypnotics. I grew gradually better; and now I can say I am as well, apparently, as I have ever been. I regard the Electropoise as an instrument of great curative value."

Our 128-page illustrated book will be mailed free upon request to yourself and friends.

Also upon request we will mail a 12-page treatise on rheumatism and its cure.

The hymn has a singular history, and is a proof of the fact that God

It is said that Mrs. Adams was a Unitarian; but the Trinitarian spirit of the hymn is so evident in every line, that it has been accepted and sung by Christians throughout the world. It was written as a personal experience, and a memorial of answered prayer.

A. S., Bivins, Texas. Why has the Revised Version changed the expression "born of the Spirit" to "begotten of the Spirit" in so many

The word "begotten" more accurately expresses the meaning of the original. The activity of the Spirit antedates the new birth. It is shown in the conviction and the repentance which issues in regeneration. The work of the Spirit commences the new life which eventually is seen of men.

B. E. J. Please advise a young girl who can no longer attend school, but wishes to improve her education, what to read. There is a public library here, where I can obtain any kind of books.

Probably the best plan would be for you to join a Chautauqua or some reading circle, and take their regular course. Desultory reading, without a fixed plan, will accomplish little; whereas a judicious course will improve the mind of any student who pursues it conscientiously.

J. I. R., Tavestock Ont. According to Scripture how should the tenth be given? Are rich and poor under the same obligation?

If you are a Jew, as we suppose, you should follow the law laid down (Lev. 27: 30-33; Deut. 14: 22, etc.). If you are a Christian you have nothing to do with the law of tenths. The Christian is not under law, and is, therefore, not bound to give a tenth, nor is he limited to a tenth. If he has a willing heart and has enough money he will give far more than a tenth. Many give a fifth, and some more. You are free whether you are rich or poor, and are under no obligation but that of your own conscience. The Jew was required to give a tenth, and it must be supposed that the Christian, with his better privileges and greater light, would, when left to himself, give more rather than less, but there is no law.

Apropos of the subject of Bible-reading, Mrs. N. P. A., of Sanford, Me., sends this letter:

would be spoiled if left till Monday, then it becomes a necessity to pick them in order to save them. But such a contingency is very unlikely. The probability is that the loss of the berries would have been a mere trifle in your eyes and, therefore, they should have been unhesitatingly sacrificed, rather than be made a cause of Sabbath desecration. Your own conscience will decide whether it was an absolute necessity to pick them or not. The path of Christian duty is clear enough if one chooses to walk in it.

E. J. S., Cambridge, O. Will persons who are unconverted at the second coming of Christ have an opportunity of accepting him then?

It is believed that the number of persons who will be converted then, will exceed all previous records. "A nation will be born in a day." The slaughter described in Revelation, will be of those who are in active rebellion against him. Eventually, the whole world will yield to him and "every knee shall bow and every tongue confess."

M. E. C., Ogden, Ark. 1. Will the heathen who have had no opportunity of accepting Christ all be lost? 2. Is it possible for a man to be saved if he is a Christian, but has not joined a church?

1. It is not for us to limit the mercy of God. We do not know how they can be saved, but God may find a way. In any case, their condition will not be so bad as that of people who have wilfully rejected Christ. The principle laid down by Christ was (Luke 12: 48), "He that knew not and did commit things worthy of stripes shall be beaten with few stripes." Their condition, however, does not rest with us. Our duty is to give them the Gospel, which will do more for them than

1. Our Lord did not sanction the act. He simply pointed out the man's eagerness and determination to secure the treasure. His argument practically was: If a man will sell all that he has in order to buy a field in which he has found a treasure, how much more should a man sacrifice everything to secure the treasure of entrance into the kingdom of heaven. He should forsake all to follow Christ. If I say: "You know how prize-fighters will deny themselves while they are in training, should not you do the same in your spiritual conflicts?" does the remark sanction prize-fighting? 2. The Jews had a great reverence for David, so when they complained to Jesus about his disciples breaking one of their technical laws of the Sabbath, he reminded them how David had set aside a technicality when he was hungry. The rabbis held that a man must not on the Sabbath pull an ear of corn because that would be a kind of reaping, nor must he rub an ear in his hands for that would be a kind of grinding. It was pertinent to the subject, therefore that Christ should remind them of David's violation of a

Desolate Days in China

The Poor Old Empire, War-worn and Flood-Swept, Now an Object of Pity to its Neighbors

READERS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will doubtless recall the great flood which swept over a number of Chinese provinces last year, the disastrous effects of which were graphically described in letters received from Rev. Dr. and Mrs. S. M. I. Baldwin, well known American missionaries. U. S. Consul John Fowler, of Chefoo, China, in reply to our request for information, has sent us a letter enclosing several photographs of the flooded districts, which are reproduced on this page These photographs were taken by Dr. Charles Lewis, who is stationed at Shantung, the capital of the province.

From another correspondent, Mr. H. Bruhn, now traveling in the East, we received a most interesting lette dated at Hongkong. He writes:

"There is no doubt that Japan, through her recent war with China, has shown to the world that the army and navy of the latter country are mere figureheads and not to be considered as a means of national protection. Before the war between China and Japan, most people were of the opinion that the Chinese would defend their country with a heroic patriotism, in case they were attacked by a foreign power; but of course this opinion has vanished. The Japanese have demonstrated to the world the utter deficiency of the Chinese army and navy, and have proven furthermore, that there exists no patriotic feeling among the inhabitants of that vast empire.

"The Chinese Government system is a complete failure. The mandarins, who are nominated by the provincial Viceroys to supervise certain districts, accept their respective positions with the view of enriching themselves during the term of their administration at the expense of both the public and the Imperial Government. As an illustration of this statement I will recite only one incident, which is very significant: Just before the outbreak of hostilities between China and Japan, a mandarin ordered, through a well known foreign business house in Hongkong, a large quantity of bogus ammunition, the cartridges to contain only a few grains of powder and the bullets to consist of wood. This so-called ammunition was furnished, and the mandarin in town sold it to the government at a much higher price than he had contracted for, and the government supplied the troops with this bogus ammunition.

"There is a regular system of jobbery in which the representatives of the Imperial Government are interested. The people are taxed to the utmost, in order to fill the pockets of the mandarins, and the people naturally have no friendly inclinations towards the government. This system of continuous robbery kills any feeling of unity and patriotism among the Chinese, and what are the consequences? Hardly was the war with Japan finished, when Russia, always aggressive in the Orient, demanded permission to build her Siberian Railway through Manchuria to Vladivostok, with a branch line through the Siasting peninsula to Port Arthur. France insisted that the Chinese Government should build a railroad from Nanning-Fu to the terminal of the Teukin (French) Railroad on the frontier. These privileges were granted.

A LINE OF REFUGEES' HOMES

"Germany followed next. The murder of two of her missionaries in Shantung was the excuse for acquiring a slice of China, and as soon as the harbor of Kiaschow-Bay, situated near the province in which the murder had been committed, was occupied by a German squadron, the Germans asked for a long lease on that port and surroundings, and the Chinese Government granted this demand.

"Russia was not slow in demanding a lease of Port Arthur, and England, to be on an equal footing, asked for a lease of Wei-hai-wei on the same terms as the German and Russian leases.

"Everything was granted by the Chinese Government, and even when France took possession of a harbor in Kwan-tung, the Chinese did not seriously object. Russia then asked for permission to protect her new railroad lines, now in course of construction from the Siberian frontier to Port Arthur and through Manchuria to Vladivostock, by her own troops; and when the permission was given, a large number of Cossacks were sent to Manchuria, much larger than actually needed for the protection of the railroad lines; and even now it is an open secret that each working man employed by the Russian Government, in the construction of the new railroads in Manchuria, is a discharged soldier, and that large armories are stationed at points along the lines. Russia has without doubt gained a decisive victory in diplomacy over other foreign powers in the Orient.

A PARTIALLY DESTROYED VILLAGE

THE HOANG-HO AT THE SUBSIDENCE OF THE FLOOD

"Japan has long been wanting to take Korea, and if Russia should attempt to invade that empire with her troops, Japan will be her natural rival and adversary. Russia is spending more money in building the great Siberian Railway than she anticipated, and her finances at the present time are not flourishing.

"The resources of China are said to be immense, and it is to be taken as granted that all the ports, now in the possession of foreign powers, will in due course of time open up a vast country, thus establishing important trade for their possessors. The United States has taken no part in this division of the Chinese coast. American interests in China are few so far; but it cannot be doubted that the commercial relations between the United States and China will gradually increase. Even now, there is a keen competition between the Americans and British in cotton piece goods, which were heretofore supplied exclusively by England. In flour and coal-oil the Americans do a larger business than any other nation, although a large Dutch syndicate is now shipping Sumatra coal-oil to China. These two articles comprise the principal American commercial interests in China, but it is evident that within a short time other American manufactures will be sold there.

"There are not more than about 300 Americans living in the various treaty ports of China who are actually engaged in business, while there is constantly a large number of American visitors present. This figure does not, however, include the American missionaries, of whom there is quite a number stationed here. China offers, undoubtedly, good opportunities for American trade, and the sooner the American manufacturers conclude to study the Chinese market and to send out their representatives, thus making the first and only successful step towards a commercial intercourse, the better.

"I have made various inquiries in regard to the relief measures for flood sufferers in China. The U. S. Consul at Foo-chow is in charge of the distribution of the funds sent from the United States for alleviating the sufferings of those people. We hear of an overflow of the Yang-tze-kiang or Yellow River in China every now and then, and in connection therewith, of the death of many people, and the sufferings of a great many more These inundations are due to the fact that the banks or the Yellow River are very low and its mouths not sufficiently deep to give the waters free outlet whenever especially heavy rains cause the river to rise suddenly. The water naturally spreads out over the banks on both sides of the river, overflowing rice fields, and carrying with it huts, houses, and everything within its reach. Many lives are lost during such periods. The poor people, whose rice fields—their only resource—have been destroyed by the cruel floods, have nothing to sustain life, and the sufferings in these stricken districts must be appalling. Although a little rice seed represents only an exceedingly small value, it must be remembered that sometimes millions of people are rendered penniless by these floods, and it naturally costs a great deal of money to supply such a vast number with new seed."

EASY DIVORCE

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Matthew 19: 6, . . . What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

THAT there are hundreds and thousands of infelicitous homes in America no one will doubt. If there were only one skeleton in the closet, that might be locked up and abandoned, but in many a home there is a skeleton in the hallway and a skeleton in all the apartments. "Unhappily married" are two words descriptive of many a homestead. It needs no orthodox minister to prove to a badly mated pair that there is a hell: they are there now. Sometimes a grand and gracious woman will be thus incarcerated, and her life will be a crucifixion, as was the case with Mrs. Sigourney, the great poetess and the great soul. Sometimes a consecrated man will be united to a fury, as was John Wesley, or united to a vixen, as was John Milton. Sometimes, and generally, both parties are to blame, and Thomas Carlyle is an intolerable grumbler, and his wife has a pungent retort always ready, and Froude, the historian, pledged to tell the plain truth, has to pull aside the curtain from the lifelong squabble at Craigenputtock, and 5 Cheyne Row.

Some say that for the alleviation of all these domestic disorders of which we hear, easy divorce is a good prescription. God sometimes authorizes divorce as certainly as he authorizes marriage. I have just as much regard for one lawfully divorced as I have for one lawfully married. But you know and I know that wholesale divorce is one of our national scourges. I am not surprised at this when I think of the influences which have been abroad militating against the marriage relation. For many years the platforms of the country rang with talk about a free-love millennium. There were meetings of this kind held in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn; Cooper Institute, New York; Tremont Temple, Boston, and all over the land. Some of the women who were most prominent in that movement have since been distinguished for great promiscuosity of affection. Popular themes for such occasions were the tyranny of man, the oppression of the marriage relation, women's rights, and the affinities. Prominent speakers were women with short curls and short dress and very long tongue, everlastingly at war with God because they were created women; while on the platform sat meek men with soft accent and cowed demeanor, apologetic for masculinity, and holding the parasols while the termagant orators went on preaching the gospel of free love. That campaign of about twenty years set more devils into the marriage relation than will be exorcised in the next fifty. Men and women went home from such meetings so permanently confused as to who were their wives and husbands that they never got out of the perplexity, and the criminal and the civil courts tried to disentangle the Iliad of woes, and this one got alimony, and that one got a limited divorce, and this mother kept the children on condition that the father could sometimes come and look at them, and these went into poorhouses, and those went into an insane asylum, and those went into dissolute public life, and all went to destruction. The mightiest war ever made against the marriage institution was that free-love campaign, sometimes under one name and sometimes under another.

Another influence that has warred upon the marriage relation has been polygamy in Utah. That is a stereotyped caricature of the marriage relation, and has poisoned the whole land. You might as well think that you can have an arm in a state of mortification and yet the whole body not be sickened, as to have any Territories or States polygamized and yet the body of the nation not feel the putrefaction. Hear it, good men and women of America, that so long ago as 1862 a law was passed by Congress forbidding polygamy in the Territories and in all the places where they had jurisdiction. Thirty-seven years have passed along and nine administrations. Yet not until the passage of the Edmunds' Law in 1882 was any active policy of polygamic suppression adopted. Armed with all the power of government, and having an army at their disposal, the first brick had not till then been knocked from that fortress of libertinism. Every new President in his inaugural tickled that monster with the straw of condemnation, and every Congress stultified itself in proposing some plan that would not work. Polygamy stood in Utah and in other of the Territories, more entrenched, more brazen, more puissant, more braggart and more internal than at any time in its history. James Buchanan, a much-abused man of his day, did more for the extirpation of this villainy than all the subsequent administrations dared to do up to 1882. Mr. Buchanan sent out an army, and although it was halted in its work, still he accomplished more than the subsequent administrations, which did nothing but talk, talk, talk. Even at this late day, and with the Edmunds' Act in force, the evil has not been wholly extirpated. Polygamy in Utah, though outlawed, is still practised in secret. It has warred against the marriage relation throughout the land. It is impossible to have such an awful sewer of iniquity sending up its miasma, which is wafted by the winds north, south, east, and west, without the whole land being affected by it.

Another influence that has warred against the marriage relation in this country has been a pustulous literature, with its millions of sheets every week choked with stories of domestic wrongs, and infidelities, and massacres, and outrages, until it is a wonder to me that there are any decencies or any common sense left on the subject of marriage. One-half of the news-stands of our great cities reek with the filth.

"Now," say some, "we admit all these evils, and the only way to clear them out or to correct them, is by easy divorce." Well, before we yield to that cry, let us find out how easy it is now. I have looked over the laws of all the States, and I find that while in some States it is easier than in others, in every State it is easy. The State of Illinois, through its legislature, recites a long list of proper causes for divorce, and then closes up by giving to the courts the right to make a decree of divorce in any case where they deem it expedient. After that you are not surprised at the announcement that in one county of the State of Illinois, in one year, there were 833 divorces. If you want to know how easy it is, you have only to look over the records of the States. In Massachusetts, 600 divorces in one year; in Maine, 478 in one year; in Connecticut, 401 divorces in one year; [illegible] in one year; in New England, in one year, 2,113 divorces, and in twenty years in New England, twenty thousand. Is that not easy enough? If the same ratio continue, the ratio of multiplied divorce and multiplied causes of divorce, we are not far from the time when our courts will have to set apart whole days for application, and all you will have to prove against a man, will be that he left his slippers in the middle of the floor, and all you will have to prove against a woman, will be that her husband's overcoat was buttonless. Causes of divorce doubled in England, and doubled in the United States. To show how very easy it is, I have [illegible] Western Reserve, Ohio, the proportion of divorces to marriages celebrated was in one year one to eleven; in Rhode Island, one to thirteen; in Vermont, one to fourteen. Is not that easy enough?

I want you to notice that frequency of divorce always goes along with the dissoluteness of society. Rome for five hundred years had not one case of divorce. Those were her days of glory and virtue. Then the reign of vice began, and divorce became epidemic. If you want to know how rapidly the Empire went down, ask Gibbon. Do you know how the Reign of Terror was introduced in France? By 20,000 cases of divorce in one year in Paris. What we want in this country and in all lands, is that divorce be made more and more difficult. Then people before they enter that relation, will be persuaded that there will probably be no escape from it, except through the door of the sepulchre. Then they will pause on the verge of that relation, until they are fully satisfied that it is best, and that it is right, and that it is happiest. Then we shall have no more marriages in fun. Then men and women will not enter the relation with the idea it is only a trial trip, and if they do not like it they can get out at the first landing. Then this whole question will be taken out of the frivolous into the tremendous, and there will be no more joking about the blossoms in a bride's hair than about the cypress on a coffin.

What we want, is that the Congress of the United States move for the changing the national Constitution, so that a law can be passed which shall be uniform all over the country, and what shall be right in one State, shall be right in all the States, and what is wrong in one State, will be wrong in all the States. How is it now? If a party in the marriage relation gets dissatisfied, it is only necessary to move to another State to achieve liberation from the domestic tie, and divorce is effected so easily, that the first one party knows of it, is by seeing it in the newspaper that Rev. Dr. Somebody a few days or weeks afterward introduced into a new marriage relation a member of the household, who went off on a pleasure excursion to Newport, or a business excursion to Chicago. Married at the bride's house. No cards. There are States of the Union which practically put a premium upon the disintegration of the marriage relation, while there are other States, like the State of New York, which has the pre-eminent idiocy of making marriage lawful at twelve and fourteen years of age.

The Congress of the United States needs to move for a change of the national Constitution, and then to appoint a committee—not made up of single gentlemen, but of men of families, and their families in Washington—who shall prepare a good, honest, righteous, comprehensive, uniform law that will control everything from Sandy Hook to Golden Gate. That will put an end to brokerages in marriage. That will send divorce lawyers into a decent business. That will set people agitated for many years on the question of how they shall get away from each other to planning how they can adjust themselves to the more or less unfavorable circumstances.

More difficult divorce will put an estoppal to a great extent upon marriage as a financial speculation. There are men who go into the relation just as they go into Wall Street to purchase shares. The female to be invited into the partnership of wedlock is utterly unattractive, and in disposition a suppressed Vesuvius. Everybody knows it, but this masculine candidate for matrimonial orders, through the commercial agency or through the county records, finds out how much estate is to be inherited, and he calculates it. He thinks out how long it will be before the old man will die, and whether he can stand the refractory temper until he does die, and then he enters the relation: for he says, "If I cannot stand it, then through the divorce law I will back out." That process is going on all the time, and men enter into the relation without any moral principle, without any affection, and it is as much a matter of stock speculation as anything that was transacted yesterday in Union Pacific, Wabash, [illegible] ing men to reform them. If a young man, by twenty-five years of age or [illegible] years of age, have the habit of strong drink fixed on him, he is as certain [illegible] drunkards' graves as [illegible] train starting out from Grand Central [illegible] from the track. The young man may not reach a drunkard's grave, for something may throw him off the iron track of evil habit; but the probability is that the train that starts to-morrow morning at eight o'clock for Albany will get there, and the probability is that the young man who has the habit of strong drink fixed on him before twenty-five or thirty years of age, will arrive at a drunkard's grave. She knows he drinks, although he tries to hide it by chewing cloves. Everybody knows he drinks. Parents warn, neighbors and friends warn. She will reform him, she will reform him. If she is not successful in the experiment, why then the divorce law will emancipate her, because habitual drunkenness is a cause for divorce in Indiana, Kentucky, Florida, Connecticut, and nearly all the States. So the poor thing goes to the altar a sacrifice. If you will show me the [illegible] struck streets in any city, I will show you the homes of the women who married men to reform them. In one case out of ten thousand it may be a successful experiment. But never saw the successful experiment. But have a rigorous divorce law, and that woman will say, "If I am affianced to that man, it is for life; and if now in the ardor of his young love, I the prize to be won, he will not give up his cups, when he has won the prize, surely he will not give up his cups," and so that woman will say to the man, "Sir, you are already married to the bottle, and you are married to that evil habit, and so you are married twice, and you are a bigamist. Go!"

A rigorous divorce law will also do much to hinder hasty and inconsiderate marriages. Under the impression that one can be easily released, people enter the relation without inquiry and without reflection. Romance and impulse rule the day. Perhaps the only ground for the marriage compact is that she likes his looks, and he admires the graceful way she passes around the ice cream at the picnic! It is all they know about each other. It is all the preparation for it. A man not able to pay his own board bill, with not a dollar in his pocket, will stand at the altar and take the bride's hand, and say, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow!" A woman that could not make a loaf of bread to save her life will swear to love and keep him in sickness and in health. A Christian will marry an atheist, and that always makes conjoined wretchedness: for if a man does not believe there is a God he is neither to be trusted with a dollar nor with your lifelong happiness. Having read much about love in a cottage people brought up in ease will go and starve in a hovel. Runaway matches and elopements, nine hundred and ninety-nine out of one thousand of which mean death and hell, multiplying on all hands. You see them in every day's newspapers.

Our ministers in some regions have no defence such as they have in other regions where the banns must be previously published and an officer of the law must give a certificate that all is right: so clergymen are left defenceless, and unite those who ought never to be united. Perhaps they are too young, or perhaps they are standing already in some domestic compact. By the wreck of ten thousand homes, by the holocaust of ten thousand sacrificed men and women, by the hearthstone of the family which is the cornerstone of the State, and in the name of that God who hath set up the family institution and who hath made the breaking of the marital oath the most appalling of all perjuries, I implore the Congress of the United States to make some righteous, uniform law for all the States and from ocean to ocean, on this subject of marriage and divorce.

Let me say to all young people, before you give your heart and hand in holy alliance, use all caution; inquire outside as to habits, explore the disposition, scrutinize the taste, question the ancestry and find out the ambitions. Do not take the heroes and the heroines of cheap novels for a model. Do not put your lifetime happiness in the keeping of a man who has a reputation for being a little loose in morals, or in the keeping of a woman who dresses immodestly. Hear it, hear it! The only foundation for happy marriage that ever has been or ever will be, is good character.

Ask the counsel of father and mother in this most important step of your life. They are good advisers. They are the best friends you ever had. They made more sacrifices for you than anyone else ever did, and they will do more to-day for your happiness than any other people. Ask them, and, above all, ask God. I used to smile at John Brown of Haddington because, when he was about to offer his hand and heart in marriage to one who became his lifelong companion, he opened the conversation by saying, "Let us pray." But I have seen so many shipwrecks on the sea of matrimony, I have made up my mind that John Brown of Haddington was right. A union formed in prayer will be a happy union, though sickness pale the cheek, and poverty empty the bread tray, and death open the small graves, and all the path of life be strewn with thorns, from the marriage altar with its wedding march and orange blossoms clear on down to the last farewell at that gate where Isaac and Rebecca, Abraham and Sarah, Adam and Eve parted.

In the "Farm-ballads" our American poet puts into the lips of a repentant husband, after a life of married perturbation, these suggestive words:

And when she dies I wish that she would be laid by me,
And lying together in silence, perhaps we will agree.
And if ever we meet in heaven, I would not think it queer
If we love each other better because we quarrelled here.

And let me say to those of you who are in happy married union, avoid first quarrels; have no unexplained correspondence with former admirers; cultivate no suspicions; in a moment of bad temper do not rush out and tell the neighbors; do not let any of those gadabouts of society unload in your house their baggage of gab and tittle-tattle; do not make it an invariable rule to stand on your rights; learn how to apologize; do not be so proud, or so stubborn, or so devilish that you will not make up. Remember that the worst domestic misfortunes and bad divorce cases started from little infelicities. Some of the greatest domestic misfortunes and the widest resounding divorce cases have started from little misunderstandings that were allowed to go on and go on until home, and respectability, and religion, and immortal soul went down in the crash.

Fellow-citizens as well as fellow-Christians, let us have a divine rage against anything that wars on the marriage state. Blessed institution! Instead of two arms to fight the battle of life, four. Instead of two eyes to scrutinize the path of life, four. Instead of two shoulders to lift the burden of life, four. Twice the energy, twice the courage, twice the holy ambition, twice the probability of worldly success, twice the prospects of heaven. Into that matrimonial bower God fetches two souls. Outside the bower, room for all contentions, and all bickerings, and all controversies, but inside that bower there is room for only one guest—the angel of love. Let that angel stand at the floral doorway of this Edenic bower with drawn sword to hew down the worst foe of that bower—easy divorce. And for every Paradise lost may there be a Paradise regained. And after we quit our home here may we have a brighter home in heaven, at the windows of which, this moment, are familiar faces watching for our arrival.

Congregationalists From Many Lands

Meeting of the Second International Council of Congregational Churches This Week in Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass.

(See portraits on first page)

THE date of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be a red-letter day in the history of American Congregationalism. It is the day set for the assembling of the International Council at Boston, Mass. Four hundred delegates are expected to be present—two hundred from the United States, one hundred from Great Britain, and one hundred from other parts of the world, including Canada, Norway, Australia and Japan. No such gathering has taken place since 1891, when three hundred delegates assembled at the first International Council, and many American clergymen took part. In some respects the Council was an innovation in the Congregational body. A cardinal principle in Congregationalism is the inherent right of every church to manage its own affairs in its own way, free from the control of any Council, Presbytery or Conference. It is in short the principle of the Republican form of government applied to religion. No bishop or elder or any other authority has the right to appoint or remove a pastor or to interfere in any way with the affairs of an individual church. The same principle is in force in the Baptist and Unitarian denominations and among the Disciples. It was therefore with some misgivings that the English churches in 1831 organized a National Council. But no harm came of the movement, and it proved a distinct advantage in promoting fellowship and drawing the churches into closer relationship. The English example was followed in America in 1865, and arrangements were made for holding a meeting of the Council every third year. Similar movements took place in Canada and Australia, and at these, hospitable welcome was given to members of other National Councils. So much good feeling was manifested toward the visitors, and so much cordiality was felt, that the suggestion of an International Council, made in several meetings, was heartily approved. The assembly, which was under the presidency of the late Dr. R. W. Dale, proved so beneficial and stimulating to all who attended, that the project of holding a second International Council took shape, and the churches of the United States claimed the privilege of being the hosts. The invitation was cordially accepted, and the most distinguished men in the denomination, both clergymen and laymen, have been chosen as delegates, and with them several ladies, whose services in the mission field and in educational institutions give them the right to be heard in such an assembly.

The Council has no disciplinary or legislative functions; it will formulate no creed nor pronounce on any disputed questions of doctrine, nor indict any member for heresy, nor declare any minister superannuated; but will consult on the best methods of advancing Christ's kingdom and discuss practical modes of church work and the best way of exerting an influence on social and public life, in the interest of righteousness. The mutual advantage of such an exchange of ideas is manifest, and is likely to result, as it did in the former council, in increased activity and the adoption of new lines of aggressive work.

On the first page we give portraits of some of the most prominent members of the Council. Dr. Andrew M. Fairbairn, who has the reputation of being one of the most distinguished theologians of Great Britain, is the Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford. Dr. Alexander McKennal is another distinguished English delegate. He is pastor of a church at Bowdon, near Manchester, and is a man of wide influence. From Canada comes Principal J. H. George, of Montreal. The American churches are well represented by Dr. R. S. Storrs and Dr. A. J. Lyman of Brooklyn, Dr. Albert E. Dunning, editor of the Congregationalist, Rev. Howard A. Bridgman, Rev. James Ross, Rev. Albert H. Plumb, the famous temperance advocate, and the Hon. S. B. Capen, the well-known Sunday School worker, who has served as chairman of the committee of arrangements. The three ladies who will take part in the proceedings are Miss Grace N. Kimball, of Vassar College, the heroine of Van in Armenia, who protected Armenian women and children, at the risk of her own life, from the brutality of the Turkish soldiery; Miss Margaret J. Evans, from Northfield, Minn., and Mrs. E. S. B. Armitage, the sweet hymn-writer of Rawdon, England. The sessions of the Council will be held in the new Tremont Temple, and will continue until September 28. Among the topics to be discussed are: Fundamental Principles in Theology; The Christian Idea of the State; The Church in Social Reform; Tendencies of Modern Education; The Pastoral Function, Congregational and Civic; Obligations and Opportunities of Congregationalism; International Relations and Responsibilities; Message of the Old Testament for To-day; The Distinctive Principles of Christianity; The Religious Motive in Education; The Spiritual Life in Our Churches; Woman's Work in Foreign Missions; Independence and Fellowship; The Holy Spirit in the Churches.

Papers on these and kindred subjects will be read by American clergymen and by the foreign delegates, and in every instance opportunity will be afforded for discussion. In a denomination in which the most unrestricted freedom is allowed to the ministers there will naturally be wide differences of opinion, which will find expression in these discussions. It is not anticipated that any serious divergence will be manifested, and there is reason to believe that every member will recognize the right of every other to the same freedom of utterance that he claims for himself. The subjects of the papers show that the trend of [illegible] church is away from the old doctrinal debating grounds in which election, the Divine Sovereignty and foreordination were conspicuous, and is in the direction of practical work, personal consecration and the influence of the Christian on modern life. Even the Higher Criticism, which, if report may be trusted, has affected Congregational ministers more than those of other churches, is not prominent in the programme, though it may come to the front in the debates.

The chairman of the Council will be the Hon. James B. Angell, President of Michigan University. The honor was offered to Dr. R. S. Storrs, of Brooklyn, but under the imperative prohibition of his physicians that eminent clergyman felt it his duty to decline. The chair will, however, be ably filled by Dr. Angell, who is one of the most prominent Congregationalists in this country. He has won laurels as professor, editor, author and diplomat, and is a man of marked ability, profound learning and finished culture. One name which appears on the programme will call up sad associations. A paper on the permanent motive in missionary work was to have been read by the Rev. Charles M. Lamson, D. D., of Hartford, Conn., the Chairman of the American Board of Commissioners on Foreign Missions. As already announced in this journal, Dr. Lamson has been called to his reward since the programme was prepared. His place as speaker on Foreign Missions will be occupied by Dr. R. S. Storrs, who preceded Dr. Lamson in the chairmanship of the Board.

An interesting personality in a New England city is that of Dr. John Brown, of Bedford, England, whose history of the Pilgrim Fathers has made him widely known to American readers. Probably no minister of the Congregational Church in England has won so high a regard from members of his own and other communions by his scholarship and his genial personal qualities. He is sure of a cordial reception on this side the Atlantic. The American members of the Council will have the opportunity of welcoming an old friend in a new guise, in the person of Dr. L. L. D. Bevan, formerly of New York, who comes to the Council as a delegate from Melbourne, Australia, where his preaching and personal influence have made him a power in the colony.

Arrangements have been made for a pilgrimage to historic Salem and to Plymouth, two towns of hallowed association to all Congregationalists. It is fitting that the Council of the Church, which sent to America the Pilgrim Fathers, should honor the memory of those heroic men by paying a reverent visit to the scenes of their sufferings and their triumphs.

Joy in God's House

S. S. Lesson for October 1. Psalm 122
Golden Text, Psalm 122 : 1

THIS psalm is essentially Jewish. It is supposed to have been (in common with Psalms 120-134, which are all entitled "songs of degrees" or "ascents"), sung by the Jewish pilgrims on their way up to the Holy City to keep the annual feasts. "I had gone with the multitude, I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with the multitude that kept holy day" (Ps. 42 : 4; see also Isa. 30 : 29). But the spirit of the psalm is the true spirit of worship for all time, and we may therefore learn precious lessons from it.

Why was the Psalmist glad to "go into the house of the Lord?" What did he intend to do there? He would not be alone, others would join him: "Whither the tribes go up, even the tribes of the Lord." What for? Not to get a little personal joy or comfort, but "for a testimony unto Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord." The Psalmist proposes to himself no personal satisfaction, nothing that he can get: his joy is to give thanks to the name of the Lord. This was the testimony of Israel, and this was to him the highest satisfaction. His thoughts were not centred upon himself, but upon his God. "Enter into his gates with thanksgiving and into his courts with praise, be thankful unto him and bless his name. For the Lord is good, his mercy endureth forever, and his faithfulness unto all generations" (Ps. 100 : 5). The testimony unto Israel was the appreciation of Israel's God.

Such is the spirit of this psalm. There is prayer, but it is unselfish prayer. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem," said the Psalmist, "they shall prosper that love thee." The worshipers prayed, not so much for themselves, their families, their tribes, their cities or homesteads, but for Jerusalem, the beloved city. Why should our prayers be so often selfish? How often it happens that when we pray for others, God gives us the longing of our own hearts! Paul teaches us to pray "for all saints," in the Spirit, at all seasons, with all prayer and supplication, watching thereunto in all perseverance and supplication (Eph. 6 : 18, R. V.).

We Christians are members of one body—the holy body of Christ—as the Jews were members of one nation—the holy nation of Israel. They saw Jerusalem "compact together." If we enter into the true unity of the Spirit, we see more and more how all saints are compact together—inter-dependent with one common life and with interests in common; and the more our hearts are drawn out in prayer for our fellow-members, the more we see how safe our own interests are, for we cannot dissociate them from our great Head and those of the other members. That which touches them touches us; "whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; if one member is honored, all the members rejoice with it" (I. Cor. 12 : 26).

Unity produces assurance. "Peace be within thy walls and prosperity within thy palaces." This is more than a wish; it is the authoritative declaration of one who has made out his cause with God. It was our Lord to the Samaritan woman, "when the true worshipers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him" (John 4: 23). Thank God, he has some true worshipers who are glad to go up to the house of the Lord; whose hearts are full of holy adoration, who do enter into his gates with thanksgivings, and into his courts with praise. They are a blood-bought people, and they cannot forget they have been redeemed. With them [illegible] attractions meet with no response.

JERUSALEM AS IT IS "BUILDED AS A CITY THAT IS COMPACT TOGETHER"

number of churches go down to the world to borrow attractions which will enable them to fill the churches! Oh, that they knew the power of the Word of God and his Spirit to attract! Honest-minded worldly people see the bait and are disgusted with it. If it is the right thing to go in for amusements, they would rather have them without church patronage, but in the depth of many a heart there is a deep cry for something better. The world knows what its resources are, and is perfectly aware that in the times of testing—of sickness, poverty and death—they want something else than amusement, and the adulterated Christianity of the day cannot give it them: therefore they become sceptics.

Oh, the sin of offering to unsaved souls who are in the world a Christianity which is not separate from the world! Jesus says of his own: "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world" (John 17 : 14–16). Did he exaggerate? "Love not the world," says the beloved disciple, "neither the things which are in the world: if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him" (I. John 2 : 15). And yet those who profess to teach the love of the Father are offering worldly baits to induce men to come to their churches and worship him whom the world crucified! May not a great deal of the indifference and neglect of public worship in our day be attributable to this very mixture of God and mammon under the name of Christianity?

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

OUR book of Psalms appeared originally in five parts or volumes. It is easy to see, even now, where each part ended by the Amen, the ascription of praise, or some other words with which the collection was appropriately closed. A reference to the last verses of Psalms 41, 72, 89, 106 and 150 will show that these were respectively the closing Psalms of the five volumes. They do not appear to have been compiled in historical order, for the Psalms attributed to Moses are in the fourth volume, while in the second volume there are Psalms that clearly belong to the period of exile. The principle on which they were divided is still a mystery. Nor is there any reliable clue to the authorship. It is obvious from the contents of some of the Psalms attributed to David that he could not have written them, as they contain allusions to events subsequent to his time. But the authorship is not important. The beauty of their diction and the intense spirituality they express render them suitable, whosoever the author may have been, for use in every age. The majority of them were evidently written to be sung in the temple services. Some of them still bear the musical indications. Thus the fourth is set for Neginoth, that is to be accompanied by stringed instruments: the sixth and twelfth are for Sheminith, that is for bass voices: the forty-sixth for Alamoth, that is for soprano voices: the ninth for Muth-labben, that is, it is to be sung to the tune "Death of the Son": while the introduction of the word "Selah" shows where the voices paused and the instruments played alone, or vice versa. In the fifth volume, occur fifteen short hymns which are called "Songs of Degrees." These are 120–134. They appear to have been composed for singing by the pilgrims, on their journey to the capital, at the times of the feasts and to have marked degrees, or stages of their journey. The Psalm appointed for the lesson is one of them and, though attributed to David, shows no signs of his authorship. The temple referred to in the ninth verse was not built in his day: neither had it become a general custom to make pilgrimages to Jerusalem until a later date. The intense love for the city, which the Psalm expresses, seems rather [illegible] to, when, after a long period of exile, the [illegible] from the various roads leading to Jerusalem the house of the Lord on the hill of Mount Moriah.

He had the mind of the Apostle Paul, believing that for [illegible] condemned and executed rather than to live. He would gladly live on to labor for Christ, but if his period of labor [illegible] enter into rest and glory in the presence of Christ. A messenger from the court was finally sent to his cell to tell him that he had been condemned and to warn him to prepare for death. The good man heard the news calmly and, when the messenger had finished, exclaimed: "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord."

A similar thought is expressed in the well-known lines of W. Chatterton Dix:

There are, who in some vast cathedral nave
[illegible]

A city that is compact together. Being built on the summit of a hill, with ravines on all sides, it was neces[illegible] for the [illegible] ist probably refers more to the restored walls. To the Oriental mind, the dwelling within an unwalled city was like living in the open country. Now that the breaches were repaired and the wide gaps filled up, the city had the appearance of safety and security. But the walls were really of little protection to them, as they had proved in the past, and were yet to prove in the future. An enemy could make a breach in the walls. Their best protection, if they had only known it, was in so living as to have the favor of God. A great writer describes a fine house where the owner kept valuable plate and was known to have at times large sums of money, but the doors were never locked and there was no armed man to guard the property. Yet no thief ever entered. The owner was known throughout the district as a kind and benevolent man who never heard of a case of sickness or trouble or poverty without relieving it. No one would be mean enough to rob such a man. He had a better protection in the love and reverence of the community than bolts and bars could have given him.

Whither the tribes go up. For four hundreds of years after this hymn was written, people still had the idea that Jerusalem was the place where men ought to worship. But a better idea than this was taught by Christ. The time has come when men have learned that the true worship that is acceptable to God, is not identified with any place, but is dependent on the spirit of the worshiper. In a country house a mother sat weeping one winter night. Her husband came home. "Why these tears?" he asked. But he knew well enough. That day their only son had left his home to take a position in the city and the mother was concerned about his spiritual welfare. "Do not fear," the father said. "He has the love of God in his heart and wheresoever he goes, he will do right. It is not the home nor the church that will protect him now; but his own right principles and God will be with him now just as much as when he was at home."

Pray for the peace of Jerusalem. The Psalmist desired that peace might be within her walls. This was a most important thing. In Jerusalem as in the modern church, the real danger lies in home quarrels. There can be no good influence from a church when the members are at variance among themselves.

How the Flood Came to Porto Rico

A Reminiscence of Disaster—Written Expressly for "The Christian Herald"

BY MRS. GUY V. HENRY

AT THE FORD OF THE PORTUGUES RIVER, PONCE

Swollen by the great flood, this river swept many hundreds to death

WE lived in Ponce three months before being ordered to the capital at San Juan. It was more like an American town than any other place on the island, with much of the push and enterprise of our own people. The streets are wide and the "Plaza-Alhambra" is a beautiful open space, with fine, large old trees, a handsome pagoda, and the old cathedral rising in dignity above the beautiful scene at setting sun. I used to drive to the Plaza to see the evening parade and review of the First Kentucky Volunteers, then stationed in Ponce.

Now, it all comes back to memory: the expectant crowd of native citizens, the shabby carriages and restive little ponies, pushing in here and there for a view of the regiment marching up the street, and out from under the low branches of the great mango trees. The band coming on at the head, playing "Old Kentucky Home," as tramp! tramp! the fine-looking fellows swing into line, facing from the street.

The manœuvres over, a hushed silence would fall on the scene, and softly on the air would come the first notes of the "Star Spangled Banner." Every hat was at once doffed by the loyal little Porto Ricans, and with perfect reverence of attitude they stood until the last note of the national air died away in the mountains. With the first note of that now familiar air, their love so new, and yet so true and loyal, is expressed in the beautiful eyes and bared, uplifted heads.

Before the light of the setting has quite died out, we drive out to the Plaza road toward Port-au-Ponce—a straight road beneath wide-spreading mangoes, and great, dark, green-leaved plantains. Many pretty rose-bud, vine embossed, two-storied casas peep out, all green and white, from behind high iron gateways and low-barred iron fences. The late laborers are still at work in the sugar-cane fields; the narrow gauge road, three feet wide, running down between the long rows of sugar-cane; the tiny cars now loading for early dawn. The happy, singing lot of scantily-clothed men and women work on, unmindful of dark days coming all too soon to many of them. Now we pass a dozen homeward-coming, lumbering, creaking ox-carts. Row after row of wretched houses by the roadside, where naked little children played around the corners of the hut, or ran about like little hares and hounds; a happy lot with appetites all whetted for the poor meal of bananas, a bit of sugar-cane and coffee.

The natives do not always stop work at set of sun; though there is no twilight they loiter on and on about the wharfs still busy rolling in and out the many barrels, the bales of hay, all belonging to the Commissary Stores, which all went to make the Port-au-Ponce a place even after nightfall so crowded, so full of life and action, one could scarce believe oneself among the tropics, with its easy-going people.

To-night I drive out to the wharf, and sit gazing out to sea. I remember well the day when the transport Berlin brought us near the port, and how for hours we waited while the stevedores worked at the wharf, and the primitive lighters used for carrying U. S. freight from the ships went slowly back and forth, towed by a row boat, West Indian negroes the stevedores, with slim, half-naked figures, black heads and keen bright eyes, in the hot sunshine, or pouring rain, looking always like ants on an ant hill.

Now all are gone! the busy port all wrecked; the patient, long-suffering stevedores many of them lying dead to-day in the sea. The little children whose bright faces laughed back at our "vacoros tardes," that beautiful evening last November, as we drove homeward from the Plaza, were found in the early morning hour of August eighth beside the same stream. With happy frolic they played, and the shining little bodies full of life were plashing in the stream—the brown-faced mother kneeling upon the banks, all unconscious of the terrible tornado rushing toward them. A sudden darkness fills the air, a sudden whirling, then torrent arose in a moment, and carried them all out to sea, then turned with the meeting of the great swollen rivers Portugues and Canas, and hurled the masses of water back into the streets of Ponce, where the surging, whirling flood, ten feet deep, swept through the very place where the First Kentucky Volunteers had reviewed a few months ago, and where native heads had been uncovered in loyality to the new flag. On the balconies above stand no more the happy girls in dainty gowns, with roses tucked in braided locks, but haggard faces with wild eyes look down on a fearful scene of death and desolation.

Alas the little children, the gentle people, and the old face that was ever at the window on the Plaza road! Where are they? An awful tragedy to a people whose life within a year has passed through such strange ordeals. They now rest helpless in the hands of the American people. Rise up! grand American nation and hold out hands filled with generous giving for these children of our adoption, and of Nature; so like to Nature herself that with smiles, or tears, in sunshine, or in shadow, they will at heart be ever true to us.

MRS. GUY V. HENRY.

Ponce and vicinity was probably the focus of greatest violence. On the breast of the flood, in which the little river Portugues was completely hidden, whole families were swept away in their frail houses, without having had a moment of warning. In one yard, when the water had receded, were found the bodies of father, mother, daughter and grandmother. In a nearby street, among a pile of drift, were twenty-four bodies of poor peons who had huddled together to perish like rats. Another body was that of a beautiful girl, evidently refined and of good family. Dr. Sidley, an American, living at Ponce in a new and substantial house, stayed indoors until the water was up to his neck. Then he struggled out and was being swept away when someone caught him and placed him in a position of safety.

Eye-witnesses who saw the flood at its height say that the scene was grand and appalling beyond description. House after house swept past toward the sea, the cries of their occupants rising above the sound of the raging torrent. Flashes of lightning illuminated the darkness at frequent intervals, followed by deep-toned thunder. Lamps were hung upon balconies and at windows by the occupants of many houses, and the most heroic efforts were made to rescue those unfortunates who were within reach. The entire city of 30,000 souls was practically under water. Many thought the Last Day had come and shrieked aloud to heaven for mercy in their agony of terror. Others striken dumb with fear and half choked by the flood, were mute, and floated past to death in the swift torrent without uttering a sound. Some were saved on rafts of logs tied together, and others in boats. The entire household of a planter named Quinones, living near the Portugues river some distance above Ponce were swept away—some thirty persons in all.

STEVEDORES AND EMPLOYEES ENGAGED IN THE RELIEF WORK AT SAN JUAN

It is estimated that the number of deaths in the Ponce district alone will exceed 3,000, and that the total loss will be far heavier than was at first supposed.

Relief work among the survivors is proceeding actively, but the supplies thus far received need to be quadrupled in quantity to produce any material benefit. All contributions will be promptly acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The following have been received for the relief work in Porto Rico during the week:

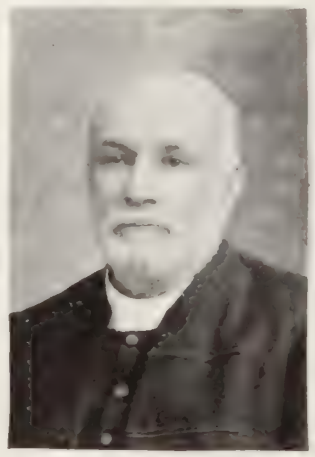
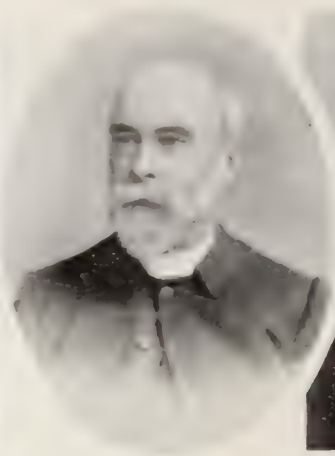
. . . The Presbyterian Family Reunion . . .

Meeting to be Held in Washington, D. C., of Representatives of Churches Holding the Presbyterian System

DR. W. G. BLAIKIE, Edinburgh

DR. WALLACE RADCLIFFE, Washington, D. C.





STATISTICAL tables give a list of twelve churches under the heading, Presbyterian, and there are, besides, three varieties of Dutch Reformed Churches which are practically under the Presbyterian system of church government, making in all fifteen denominations whose differences are of a minor character. All these have appointed delegates who will assemble in Washington, D. C., on September 27, for mutual conference and edification. They will continue in session until October 6, and have the prospect of a most enjoyable and stimulating time. This is the seventh of these family reunions that have been held, and if the list of delegates and the character of the programme may be taken as a guide, it will be one of the most important and beneficial of the series. The American Secretary, Rev. Wm. H. Roberts, D.D., LL.D., on whom has fallen the chief responsibility for this year's family conference, figures that it will represent eighty-six different denominational or national churches found on all the five continents, which churches have a total of members and adherents of about twenty-three millions.

The project of bringing together representatives of this large number of churches had its origin in the mind of the most eminent of Princeton's Presidents, Dr. James McCosh. In a history of the movement compiled for the use of the assembly, Dr. Roberts thus describes the early beginning of the project: "The idea of an organization including the several churches of the Protestant Reformation, was a favorite thought of many of the leading re- [illegible] was embodied in the second Book of Discipline of the Church of Scot- [illegible] and given a definite form in a section reading:

"There is besydes these, an uther mair gener- [illegible] of all nations and [illegible] within the Kirk, [illegible] universall Kirk of [illegible] may be callit properlie the Generall Assemblie or Generall Councell of the haill Kirk of God.

"The Synod of Dort, called by the States General of Holland, and meeting at Dort, 1618–1619, was the first of the ecumenical councils of the Reformed Churches. Invitations were sent to all the Protestant Churches, and the majority of them were represented by delegates, five of whom were from the Church of England. The Westminster Assembly, held in London, England, 1643-1652, was also in part representative of the unity of the Church, for commissioners were appointed or invited to it from the churches of Scotland, Ireland, and New England, as well as of England. That distinguished body was not therefore a local gathering, but has been justly regarded as the first of the ecclesiastical councils of English-speaking Christians. A little after the middle of the nineteenth century, influential Presbyterians in Great Britain and the United States began to suggest the forming of a general organization which should include all the Reformed Churches wherever found. Chief among these were Dr. McCosh, of Princeton and Dr. Blaikie, of the Free Church College, Edinburgh, Scotland. In the year 1870, Dr. McCosh gave expression to his views on the subject in a sermon preached before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., at Philadelphia, Pa. This was the first Assembly of the reunited Old and New School Churches, and the auspicious occasion furthered the suggestions made by him. In his discourse, Dr. McCosh said, 'It has long been a favorite idea of mine that all the Presbyterian Churches may be brought together at a Pan-Presbyterian Council at which each of them might be represented.'"

Dr. McCosh visited England and Ireland in furtherance of the project, and corresponded with representatives of churches in other European lands. Preliminary meetings were held for conference, and finally, on July 3, 1877, the first meeting of delegates was held in Edinburgh. Two hundred and twenty delegates and eighty associates assembled, representing forty-three churches. There "The Alliance of the Reformed churches throughout the world holding the Presbyterian System" was regularly organized, and has since been known as the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance. Meetings have since been held at Philadelphia, Pa., in 1880; Belfast, Ireland, in 1884; London, England, in 1888; Toronto, Canada, in 1892, and Glasgow, Scotland, in 1896.

The objects of the Alliance as defined by itself are "to consider questions of general interest to the Presbyterian community; to seek the welfare of churches, especially such as are weak or persecuted; to gather and disseminate information concerning the kingdom of Christ throughout the world; to commend the Presbyterian system as Scriptural, and as combining simplicity, efficiency and adaptation to all times and conditions; to entertain all subjects directly connected with the work of evangelization, such as the relation of the Christian Church to the evangelization of the world, the distribution of mission work, the combination of church energies, especially in reference to great cities and destitute districts, the training of ministers, the use of the press, colportage, the religious instruction of the young, the sanctification of the Sabbath, systematic beneficence, the suppression of intemperance and other prevailing vices, and the best methods of opposing infidelity and Romanism."

The Gospel on the Great Lakes

Miss Emma C. Nason's Christian Work Among the Boatmen of Sault Ste. Marie

MANY readers of this journal are already familiar with the Gospel Mission conducted by Miss Emma C. Nason among the lumbermen and boatmen of the great northern lakes. The mission headquarters are at Sault Ste. Marie. Concerning [illegible] many a hand shake as "the boys" come ashore, that saves them from the "men traps." An invitation to the Mission Hall, where meetings are held every evening, has saved many sailor boys.

"One evening a young boatman from a [illegible] head to foot, was passing the Mission for a saloon. The evangelist stopped him at the door and with a smile and hand shake the boy was won. Later we heard of him at the other end of the lakes working to save others.

"A captain of a Detroit boat was saved from a hardened life by a sermon of Dr. Talmage, found in a package thrown on the boat, and not only wrote at once and thanked the Mission workers, but has attended the meetings whenever his boat stopped long enough. He is one of the Christian captains of the lakes.

"A crippled sailor, who had sailed on all the seas of the world, was an infidel when he was stranded here. A tract given him by an evangelist on the dock brought him to God, and although he had only one hand and that hand had only one finger and thumb, he went to work on the dock and gave in one month over two hundred packages of good reading to other boatmen. The tract costing less than a penny, saved this hardened old sailor and made him a missionary."

It is now ten years since Miss Nason began her missionary labors among the "loggers" and the boatmen. Friends in many States learned of her work and aided her in many ways. She is now assisted by a small army of King's Daughters, Christian Endeavorers and others, and by evangelists, Bible-readers and tract distributors, who gladly cooperate. [illegible] ties of religious literature have been distributed. Miss Nason's work, or [illegible] in the humblest way, has been blessed and prospered, and it is now carried on in six mission houses in the four cities of Ashland, Hurley, West Superior and Sault Ste. Marie. At the latter place, there is a Home for Women and a Men's Mission, both of which have been instrumental in doing much good to a very needy class. Many opportunities for extending her work are presenting themselves, but Miss Nason finds it difficult to continue it as already established. Funds are urgently needed. Contributions may be sent to this office for her.

Famine Waifs in India

RECENT letters from India give cheering news of the progress of the little orphans to whose support the missionaries are applying the funds contributed by our readers. Rev. W. A. Mansell, the Methodist Episcopal missionary at Sitapur, thoughtfully encloses in his letter two photographs of some of the children in his institution, which we reproduce on this page. The one group is of four girls who were saved from the famine and are now in Mr. Mansell's school at Hardoi. The other is a group of boys, also famine waifs, who are taught the art of carpet weaving by a native teacher. Mr. Mansell is thus giving them an industrial training which will enable them to earn a livelihood, as well as teaching them the great truths of Christianity. He writes: "We have been encouraged in the work by a number of beautiful transformations of character among those who have thus been taken in. One of the most earnest and spiritual prayers I ever heard was from Nihali, a young girl who, nine months before had been taken in as the first famine waif at Hardoi, and who, when she came, knew nothing at all of Christianity or religion. Private contributions from Christian friends, and especially the contributions that came through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund, made it possible to help in thousands of cases where, without this help, suffering and death must have been multiplied many fold. Only eternity will reveal how many lives were saved and how much good was done by these Christian contributions. We have now in the district which is in my charge four schools in which we have children who were gathered during the famine: A boys' school at Lucknow, with nearly forty boys; a girls' school at Hardoi, with sixty girls, and two schools at Sitapur—one for boys and one for girls—with eighty and a hundred pupils respectively. What we shall do with them when the fund from which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now sending us help is exhausted I do not know. I wish some of your readers would adopt a child and pay for his or her support for a year or two. We can board, clothe and educate a child for $18 a year." We print Mr. Mansell's appeal and commend it to our readers.

REV. W. A. MANSELL'S Ffamine BOYS HAVING A LESSON IN CARPET WEAVING

It is not the will of your Father who is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish (Matt. 18: 14).

In Collision with an Iceberg.

A thrilling story of peril at sea was told by the passengers and crew of the Anchor Line steamer City of Rome, which arrived at New York from Glasgow, on September 5. The weather being thick, with a drizzling rain, on August 31, the speed of the steamer was reduced to one-quarter of the normal rate. The captain doubled the lookouts and stayed on the bridge the whole day. About five o'clock in the afternoon the fog lifted momentarily and the lookout forward cried out, "Ice dead ahead." The officers say that there was a huge iceberg not more than fifty feet away. It towered up to a great height and was covered with snow. Instantly the order was signalled to the engine room, "full speed astern," and the helm was thrown hard over to sheer the vessel to port to avoid the iceberg. The slow speed at which the vessel was going was greatly in her favor, but she had covered the fifty feet between her and the berg before she felt the backward pull of the propeller. But she was responding to the change of the helm when her bow struck the mountain of ice. There was a crash, a grinding and crunching, and the bow rose about seven feet, with a sideward list that made everything that was loose slide to port. Then she glided off smoothly and gracefully on an even keel. The only damage done was the breaking of the figure-head. As the collision occurred a thousand miles from port and there were 997 souls on board, the accident might have been a very serious one. The passengers were very thankful for their escape and they drew up a series of resolutions expressing their appreciation of the vigilance and the fidelity of the captain and his officers. It is clear that these latter were in no way to blame for the danger. The thermometer which usually indicates the approach of an iceberg had given no warning owing to the general coldness of the weather. It is so in the voyage of life. When the Christian is in a worldly atmosphere, his love and faith are liable to become cool, and he glides into dangerous situations without knowing that his spiritual life is in peril.

Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation (Matt. 26: 41).

An Invasion of Butterflies

New Yorkers were astonished a few days ago by the advent of thousands of beautiful large butterflies. They came in clouds and spread themselves all over the city. In the parks they seemed at home, flying from tree to tree, and in the Brooklyn districts where there are trees in the streets they seemed quite happy; but in the busy streets of lower New York and along the water front they appeared to be bewildered and timid. They were chased by the boys, and many flew in at the open windows of offices, where they were caught and impaled. Many alighted on the surface cars, to which they clung with difficulty owing to the current of air. They disappeared almost as suddenly as they came, but where they went to no one knows. They were of a reddish brown hue, their wings marked with black lines. Some of the larger ones measured over four inches across their outstretched wings. Entomologists say that the scientific name of them is the Danus Plexippus. Where they came from is a mystery. Some entomologists think they came from the wooded country up the river, while others think the larvae were brought to the city in the bales of hay and were hatched here. Originally this species was found only in this country, but of late it has appeared in Europe and has spread to Asia and northern Africa. Though it can fly a long distance, it is not believed that it could cross the Atlantic. Its trans-Atlantic journey was probably made in the form of larvæ attached to hay or plants, and being hardy, made itself at home wheresover it was hatched. Entomologists believe that in a short time it will be found in every country on the globe. Happily they are not noxious, so no harm can come of their spreading thus insidiously over the world. It would be well if that could be said of everything that is thus unwittingly carried from land to land. There are moral poisons, which, like the germs of disease, are carried unconsciously from one people to another and work havoc wheresoever they appear.

Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump (I. Cor. 5: 6).

A $3,000 Conversation

Among the notable local events chronicled last week by a New York journal, was the fact that the telephone company had a bill for three thousand dollars against a Brooklyn subscriber for long-distance talks. It appears that the Brooklyn man asked to be put in communication with a subscriber in St. Louis, Mo. The talk between the two began at eight o'clock in the evening when the rate is five dollars for the first five minutes and a dollar a minute afterwards. It continued until six o'clock the next morning, when the day rate, which is double those figures, begins. Then the talk stopped, to be resumed at eight o'clock in the evening. For five nights the talk was continued all through the ten hours of the night rate, and on one morning it was carried on two hours at the day rate. In all the two men talked together for fifty-two hours at a cost of $3,116. The reporter of the journal publishing the incident, tried to ascertain the subject of the expensive conversation, but found all the persons who knew it, reticent. It must have been a very important matter to justify so large an expenditure. Probably they expect that the results of the conversation will more than reimburse them. If that principle of reckoning were generally adopted, how much would a man consider a sermon worth to him that was the means of saving his soul?

Albeit I do not say to thee, how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides (Philemon 19).

Telegraphic Warnings

A scientific journal says that, among the propositions brought forward, anent the introduction of wireless telegraph signaling, is that which contemplates the warning of vessels by equipping the shore with a double line of such signals, the outer or warning ones having a range of ten miles, and the inner or danger ones about three miles; thus the whole coast line would be covered with intersecting arcs of electric influence, within which vessels with suitable instruments would be able, even in the thickest fog or the heaviest weather, to obtain information of their whereabouts, their distance from land and the special danger to be avoided. Such a proposal, says a writer in the Providence Journal, according to what has already been demonstrated by the wireless telegraph, seems, on its face, quite feasible, and a test in actual practice, on a dangerous coast, would be viewed with interest by all nations. Its value would consist in informing a captain that he was approaching danger. It is presumed that if he knew his danger he would be upon his guard. The presumption is justified in the case of mariners, but unhappily it does not apply to voyagers on the ocean of life. Warnings do not always save men from moral and spiritual shipwreck.

They mocked the messengers of God, and despised his words, and misused his prophets until the wrath of the Lord arose against his people, and there was no remedy (II. Chron. 36: 16).

BRIEF NOTES

The tobacco consumed in Great Britain and Ireland last year was over eighty million pounds, the retail price of which was at least $81,116,905.

The Church Missionary Society has just sent out its two thousand and third European missionary. The one thousandth missionary sailed in 1880.

Dr. Ladd, of Yale University, is proceeding to India to deliver lectures on Christianity on the Haskell foundation, in succession to Dr. Fairbairn. He will lecture in Calcutta, Bombay and Madras, and probably in some smaller cities.

A Half-night of Prayer was held at the headquarters of the Salvation Army in New York, on September 14. Its object was to get personal reconsecration for workers and professing Christians for the fall and winter campaign.

The Anti-Semitic movement appears to be on the increase in several European lands. In the Polish province of Lubin the regulations against the Jews are very severe. Any householder renting lodgings to a Jew incurs a fine of twenty-five dollars.

The Moravian Church spent in foreign missionary work during the last fiscal year $380,776, which leaves a deficiency of $59,340. It has in its various fields 403 missionaries and 1,914 native helpers. This does not include its leper asylum in Jerusalem nor its missions in Bohemia and Moravia.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, having concluded his post conference work at Northfield, Mass., is taking a tour through this country and Canada. The remainder of this month he spends at Toronto, Montreal and Rochester, N. Y. In October he will preach in Chicago, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, New York and Brooklyn.

Mr. Bramwell Booth, who is next to his father, Gen. Booth, in command of the Salvation Army, estimates that the money that will be needed for the year's work of the Army will not be less than two million three hundred and twenty thousand dollars. He has issued an appeal for help on the ground that the members of the Army are poor.

The death of Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, which occurred on the morning of September 12, has caused sincere sorrow in religious circles. Mr. Vanderbilt's interest in the spiritual welfare of railroad men and his generous support of Young Men's Christian Associations have been the means of good to many souls. His death will be a heavy loss to many good causes.

At the Gospel Tent "Glad Tidings" in New York, services have been conducted by the Rev. John Robertson, of Glasgow, and Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman. The audiences have been larger than ever. Rev. S. Hartwell Pratt, who has general charge of the work, writes that the movement is increasing in force and depth and that the results are truly wonderful.

Hawaii is taking an active interest in the evangelization of the Philippines. Already arrangements have been made for a Hawaiian mission in the island of Mindanao and $[illegible]00 has been raised to inaugurate it. Two brothers named Castino, natives of Guam, but residents of Honolulu for thirty years and highly esteemed in Christian work, have returned to Guam to labor there as missionaries, one of them with his wife and [illegible].

A writer in the Interior points out that the conditions in the religious world are precisely those which in philosophy, politics and science have always preceded the appearance of some great leader who has separated the real from the visionary and has proved an epoch-maker. Such a religious leader, he says, will surely appear shortly. Those Christians who are looking for the speedy appearance of Christ will appreciate this remarkable deliverance.

THE WAR CLOUD IN THE TRANSVAAL

British and Boer Armies on the Frontier—The Questions at Issue—Photographs of the Transvaal by a Special Correspondent

FOR the second time within a period of twenty years, the armies of Great Britain and the Boer Republic are confronting each other on the borders of the Transvaal. Ever since the memorable campaign of 1881, there has been a subdued antagonism between the British and the Dutch elements in South Africa, which threatened at any time to assume an acute form. Under the administration of President Paul Kruger, the Transvaal, while materially prosperous, has made little advance in its relations with the great outside world. Its people were apparently satisfied with agriculture and stock raising, and although they possessed a country whose mineral riches made it a second Ophir, they preferred their pastoral lives and crude ways to all the advantages which the full development of their territory would have brought them. They discouraged immigration; but, in these pushing, modern days, it is impossible to shut the doors, even of a little South African state, against enterprising newcomers, and as the British were the most populous and pushing of the Transvaal's neighbors, many of that nationality found their way into the Dutch Republic and opened up business relations with the Boers.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE CITY OF JOHANNESBURG, TRANSVAAL

It is not necessary here to tell the story of the gradual development of the famous Transvaal mines; of the almost fabulous wealth they disclosed; of the British capital and enterprise that were employed in their development; the concessions that were secured at enormous outlay by the miners, and the excessive burdens, to which they had to submit. The "Uitlanders," as they were denominated by the Boers, were from the first regarded as a prime source of revenue for the Transvaal treasury. As time passed and foreign interests and taxation increased together, the "Uitlanders," now greatly augmented in numbers and constituting a very important part of the population, began an agitation for legislative representation to which they considered they were entitled in view of the fact that they contributed so heavily to the state revenues. Practically everything connected with their mining and other business operations was taxed to the last scruple. Dynamite, largely used in their work, was a monoply in the hands of a Boer company, which charged double prices and divided with a "ring"; railroad freight was set at exorbitant rates, and in many other respects discrimination was made against them. It was even claimed that [illegible] in a Transvaal court.

The position of the "Uitlanders" [illegible] Failing in the effort to secure representation, they demanded to be admitted as citizens, but the laws of the republic were so framed as to postpone almost to a time [illegible] the control of [illegible]. This was the situation when the famous "Jameson raid" took place three years ago, resulting so disastrously to the raiders.

But the recent developments have added new complications. Secretary Chamberlain, in the later diplomatic [illegible] over the Transvaal, under the conventions between the two governments drawn up in 1881 and 1884. He contends that while granting to the Transvaal internal independence, suzerain rights were specifically reserved. Replying, President Kruger repudiates absolutely the claim of suzerainship. He admits Britain's right to protect her subjects, however, and suggests a joint commission to arbitrate all the points at issue, except that of suzerainty, which is denied. To this formal proposition, no answer has yet been received from Mr. Chamberlain, and as the Boer plan includes the appointment of a third or foreign representative on the proposed Arbitration Board, it is unlikely that Mr. Chamberlain will consent. The impression in England seems to be that unless the claim of suzerainty is dropped, the Boers will place such a force in the field as will compel England to have a powerful army to maintain her claims. On the issue of the present dispute, hangs the whole question of British supremacy in South Africa. Both countries are greatly excited over the situation and war feeling runs high. England is preparing to send several regiments from the United Kingdom to Natal, and a number of Indian regiments are already en route to the Cape from Simla. It is expected that the Transvaal's available fighting force will not be less than 20,000 strong. Johannesburg is practically deserted by foreigners, in view of the imminence of hostilities, and business is almost at a standstill. At a recent meeting of the Raad (or Lower Parliament), President Kruger arose and solemnly declared "in the presence of the Almighty," that the Transvaal was not and never had been a suzerain of Great Britain. At the same time, he counseled moderation on the part of his associates, and urged them to wait patiently for Mr. Chamberlain's reply. In an interview given to a correspondent at Pretoria, President Kruger has defined the attitude of the Boer government in these words: "The foreigners want all the privileges of citizenship, but they refuse to bear its most important burdens. They protested against being commandeered in 1895, though this was a test of their willingness to assume the duties of burghership. Baron Loch, then Governor of Cape Colony, represented to Kruger that the Uitlanders did not wish to become burghers, therefore he (Kruger) induced the Raad to exempt them. Later, he invited the Uitlanders to take part in the Malabach campaign, in which the Boers were then engaged, and those Uitlanders who accepted this proposition received full burghership rights." President Kruger further explained that the Convention of 1884 gave the Uitlanders civil rights, but did not confer political rights. He had desired to give them political rights by inducing them to accept military duty, but this almost all refused to do. This statement on the part of the Boer President is supplemented by a declaration from General Joubert, Commander-in-Chief of the Boer forces, that "no concession will be made to the British demands," and that that country must now either recede from her position on the questions at issue with the Transvaal, or she must fight. This firm tone is prevalent among the Boers generally. The debates in the Raad have been exceedingly warlike, and many of the delegates have demanded that, as an answer to the mobilization of British troops on the Transvaal frontier, the Boers should send a strong force to take up a strategic position and be in readiness to strike the first blow. During the recent negotiations, the Boer leaders have been quietly preparing for emergencies. A large force of riflemen have advanced within striking distance of the Pass dividing the Transvaal from Natal. These troops are said to be the best in Joubert's army—all trained sharpshooters—and they have camped a day's march from the Pass, which they can seize in ample time to check the advance of a much larger force from the unprotected plain, and thus hold the frontier against invaders. The presence of the Boers near the Pass has caused a panic in Newcastle, which lies in an exposed position, and the authorities of that town, anticipating trouble, have called for reinforcements to come to their defence.

A recent writer recalls what Livingstone wrote, concerning these Boers, more than fifty years ago. He characterized them as a sober, industrious and hospitable peasantry, but opposed to the introduction of innovations, and particularly to the work of Christian missionaries. He found them antagonistic to English laws because those laws made no distinction between black men and white. Doubtless, there is a great deal to be said in behalf of the Boers also. They have been, for many years, the target of all sorts of bold adventurous schemes and undertakings, and their rich territory has been coveted by so many, that they have naturally, and perhaps excusably, become suspicious of governments and treaties. In the interest of humanity, it is to be hoped that the proposed plan of arbitration will prevail.

A Story of a Christian Pastor's Tribulations and Comforts In an Unappreciative Parish

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

DEACON [illegible] bath evening, when the pews were thinly filled, nudged Deacon Simpson on the shoulder. "Stop in a minute or two on your way home," he said.

The second deacon nodded. "I'll just leave Marthy in the house," he answered. "and I'll be 'round."

Both deacons were elderly men, the one tall, spare, and grizzled; the other, round, rosy and baldheaded. They had been boys together, and for years had run the affairs of the Black Hill township and the Black Hill church. Nothing went there except as Deacon Baldwin moved and Deacon Simpson seconded it, and the two had sometimes the air of conspirators as they planned, not to say "plotted" together for the best interests of their neighbors. At present the senior deacon was in a mood which might well be called disgruntled. He did not like his pastor, and thought that the church was not being carried on according to business principles, and the present desire uppermost in his mind was to induce Mr. Bancroft to resign—"peaceably, if we can; forcibly, if we must," he said to himself as he weeded his garden, or weighed out sugar and butter for his customers at the country store. "The church doesn't grow." He wagged his head solemnly and thrust out the tip of his tongue a little way, as was his habit when he spoke with conviction.

"Yes, brother," replied Deacon Simpson, "but then the question is, how is it to grow in a place like Black Hill? We've got all the town there is, seems to me."

"We'd ought to draw in the young people from Topping Centre and Windy Heights. Moonlight nights, there'd ought to be courtin' couples drivin' in from ten miles round. Mr. Bancroft just jogs on: he don't announce novelties, and people demand novelties nowadays."

"Seems to me we can't do much while his salary ain't paid up," said Deacon Simpson, anxiously. "We owe him three months now, and winter's coming in, and he can't leave till we've settled accounts."

"Who's talking about his leaving?" said Deacon Baldwin, shifting his ground. "A successful man never has any trouble about salary—the salary's there. The pews bring it in, an' the collections. Mr. Bancroft's got no grit, or he'd get his salary. Did I ever tell you about the time I went to Elsmore to visit my wife's second cousin, and the way the preacher took up the collection that day? No? Then I'll tell you now. Aaron Simpson, and you'll see what I mean when I complain that our minister 's too timorous.

"They'd ben a-shinglin' the roof, and the money hed to be raised to pay the bill. When the sermon and the other exercises was over, the preacher said: 'Now we'll take up the offering. The offering's got to be large this mornin' to pay for repairs to this edifice. The elements used to beat in through the leaks in the sanctuary ceiling, and we had to have the roof fixed; fixing it cost money, and the money 's now due. Brethren, shut the door and pass the plates.'

"The plates were passed and the money was counted. It was not enough. The minister looked firmly down at the congregation. 'Brethren,' he said, 'lock them doors and give me the key. Not a soul leaves here till we have the hull amount necessary. Sing "Saved by Grace," and pass the plates again.'

"The amount was again counted. It was larger than before, but it was not yet enough.

"The preacher rose again in his place, looking very sad and stern, like a father when he's obliged to make a stand with his boys, or a teacher when he's downright mad.

"'Friends,' he said 'the doors are locked, and I've got the key in my pocket. This congregation won't be let to go home till this money for the roof is raised. Your dinners are waiting. Some of you have babies crying at home. Some of you has given till you've felt it, but none of you has been squeezed yet. I tell you this is a case of squeeze. 'Lyddy,' addressing one of the singers, 'step out and give us a solo, while the plates go round the third time. Then we'll all rise and roll out grandly, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."'

"A couple of dudes in the back seat, young men from the city, turned their purses inside out that time, an' the money was raised. What do you think of that? Wasn't he a hustler, Brother Simpson?"

"All I've got to say is that Brother Bancroft couldn't do such a thing, and you wouldn't like it if he could. But I agree with you that he's got into a rut, and a change would be a good thing—perhaps. I've nothing against Mr. Bancroft as a man. He's a fine fellow; personally I like him, but I think somebody else might do better for the Black H[illegible]

It's always a rather sorrowful crisis which has come to the church, when the leading men begin making the above distinction as they describe their feelings.

"Father," called a voice from the bedroom, on the same floor with the sittingroom, in which the two deacons were holding their evening pow-wow, [illegible]

"Well, Mother?"

The Deacon was always a little subdued by his wife.

"If you and Deacon Simpson are goin' to talk much longer, would you mind adjournin' to the parlor?"

"I'm just off," said Deacon Simpson, with a glance at the clock, which was on the eve of striking ten. "We'll continue this subject later on. Marthy 'll be wonderin' what's become of me."

As Deacon Baldwin shut and barred the door, a figure in a white nightdress emerged from the chamber. Mrs. Baldwin had thrust her feet into carpet slippers, and drawn a little checked shawl around her shoulders. She seated herself in a rocker, and looked inquiringly at her husband.

"Wot call have you and Deacon Simpson to be sittin' up so late Sunday nights, pullin' the minister to pieces?"

"I'll not be questioned, Mother."

"I want to know, I say, Robert Baldwin, wot call has Aaron putterin' 'round here so often after prayer-meetin's? I don't like it, an' I won't have it."

"There—there—Lucinda, keep quiet, do. There's no occasion for you to be stirred up. Fact is, we feel as if Mr. Bancroft's period of usefulness was about over, and we're devisin' some easy way of letting him know our opinion."

"I thought as much."

Mrs. Baldwin rose, and turned her face toward her bedroom door. "Put out the lamp, Robert, and go to your bed. You seem to have clean forgot our little Mary, and how good the minister was to her, how he loved her, how she clung to him. No: Robert, say no more to me. I'm goin' to sleep. Good night."

A similar remonstrance was in store for Deacon Simpson when he went home. Whatever the men of the parish might want, the women were solidly for their pastor. He had baptized and administered communion; he had married some of his people, and stood by the sick-beds of others, and everywhere he had brought cheer and comfort and wise counsel. Yet there were those who, because of a deficit in the treasury, easily accounted for in the changed conditions of the place, the fewness of men of means, and the absence of young people, many of whom had sought the city as a better field for earning money, were desirous that the brave and self-denying man of God should leave them. He felt the alienated atmosphere, [illegible] the bread of life to starving souls. The cold weather was approaching, and Mr. Bancroft badly needed a new overcoat, which he could not buy unless his salary was paid. Nevertheless, he resolved to make the old one, thin and threadbare, do, if he could not get another, and day by day he was seen riding his white pony over the hills, stopping at this and the other lonely cabin, and talking to men as they ploughed, or dragged, or sowed, whatever their work might be. To many a weary house-mother his call brought rest and joy; to many a fevered child he carried medicine for the body as for the mind; many a secret was whispered in his ear, and many a feud he healed.

As the malcontent deacons discussed Mr. Bancroft, he was calmly reading his New Testament, by the light of his single luxury, an astral lamp. And this was what he read, before he, too, sought his pillow on the night of our story: "Suffer hardship with me, as a good soldier of Christ Jesus. No soldier on service entangleth himself in the affairs of this life, that he may please him who enrolled him as a soldier."

"Yes, Brother Paul the Apostle," said the modern follower of Jesus, looking up to an invisible heaven, "I, too, belong to your company. I, too, for Christ's sake, can endure hardship. I, too, am a soldier on service." And, far into the night, he mused and prayed.

A group of people were gathered at five o'clock the next day in the store, which was also the Post Office, waiting for the mail. Deacon Baldwin, Deacon Simpson, and half the village were there, when a wild-eyed apparition, in the usual garb of a mountaineer, trousers tucked into high top boots, a wide slouch hat on his head, a man unkempt, and rough as his own hills, rushed in, with haste and fury.

"I want the Holy Ghost man," he cried. "Where does he live? My little Harry is dying. Tell me how to find the Holy Ghost man."

A hush fell for a second or two, as the cry for help smote like a sharp sword across the gossip about Jersey cows, and the patter of town politics. Then, a little maid in a blue cotton frock, and a slatted sunbonnet, looked up, with her violet eyes shining, and her sweet bell-like voice was the man's answer. She stood in the doorway, near the questioner.

"Mr. Bancroft lives over there," pointing with a slender, brown finger, "next to the church. He's our minister."

The next minute, the mountaineer was rapping loudly on the parsonage door. Presently Mr. Bancroft came out, and after a moment's converse, the listeners at the store heard him say:

"All right, Jack, keep up your courage. Tell Harry I'm coming. Maybe he's not so bad as you think, and please God, we'll pull him through. But if not, you and I will trust God."

In the silence of the afternoon the even tones of the minister, though not raised, carried clearly, and many heard them. The man called Jack mounted his horse and galloped madly away, and in five minutes, on his white pony, Mr. Bancroft was racing after him.

"The Holy Ghost man!" "Yes," said the little maid. "My aunt Phebe lives yonder in the hollow, up on Tom, and she says the people 'round there call Mr. Bancroft that, for they think God is all the time with him."

Could those thoughtful people have followed and entered Jack Holcomb's small cabin, they would have seen their pastor, first, as he stooped on reaching the low door, say solemnly:

"Peace be to this house!" Next, on his knees, by Harry's bed he would have uttered a prayer, tender and very simple, to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; just a simple, brief, earnest petition, for the minister always talked to God as a man talks to his friend. Then lifting the gasping and apparently dying lad in his strong arms, they would have seen him bear the child outside under the trees, away from the close and suffocating air, thick with odors of fried food, stale coffee and tobacco, and calling for water from the spring, they would have watched him bathe the child while he administered spoonfuls of hot milk and [illegible] work and the minister could say:

"Harry will do, but you must have open windows all night; I'll be back very early. Please [illegible] ness."

[illegible] to gather into his kind arms that [illegible] pastor sought his home.

In the group at the post office there had been a stranger, a man from a distant city, who had been a witness to the little scene.

"So they call your minister the Holy Ghost man, do they?" he said to Deacon Baldwin.

"Yes," the deacon hesitated, "he ain't [illegible] store by him back there in the mountains. They're a wild, ignorant lot, very poor, and they won't come to hear the Gospel."

"So your pastor carries it to them: that [illegible] over a Sunday and hear him preach. That kind of man ought to have a chance at souls in a bigger place where there are more of them. I shouldn't wonder if you people were poor judges of preaching."

The deacon frowned, but the newcomer was buying a generous bill of goods for a farm which, it seemed, he had lately purchased in the neighborhood, so he deemed it best not to notice the last remark.

But no one was to hear the Holy Ghost man in Black Hill pulpit for many a day. The pony, so sure of foot that she could go anywhere in the dark on the [illegible] stumbled on a loose stone and fell, pitching her rider over her head. She trotted home alone, and those who went to seek the minister found him lying, an unconscious heap, at the foot of one of the [illegible] ing beside him. Whether or not he will again take up his work men cannot now tell, but hillmen and villagers alike are now praying that their Holy Ghost man may be spared to them.

The two deacons wear faces of shame amid the general compassion, and the little maid in her blue cotton frock comes every day to answer the parsonage door and tell sorrowful inquirers what the doctor said on his last visit.

The Steele Orphanage Burned

A sad occurrence is reported from Chattanooga, Tenn. On August 3, the Steele Home for Needy Children—an institution with whose work many of our readers are familiar—caught fire and was almost totally destroyed. Mrs. A. S. Steele, the founder of the Home, came to Chattanooga nineteen years ago to help the poor. She felt that something permanent should be done for relieving and training the poor colored children of the city, and she undertook the task herself, devoting to it all her energies and her means. The Home has cared for 674 needy children, fifty-six of whom have married, and 192 have been sent to industrial schools at Mrs. Steele's expense to learn trades. More than 200 are out in homes. There were 157 in the building at the time of the fire, but all escaped safely.

The founder has never had wages or salary for her services. She never solicited aid, yet she has received voluntary gifts from many friends. Mrs. Steele personally knew George Muller, who founded the great orphanage in Bristol, England.

"I ventured to undertake a small work here on his plan," she explained, "and have kept out of debt and received many tokens of friendliness. Had it not been for legacies left me by a few dear friends and relatives, together with my inheritance from my father's estate, it seems as if the work must have stopped. Thus far we have been kept from want."

Mrs. Steele will make an effort to rebuild the Home, and hopes to have the assistance of friends of the work in doing so.

account of its exposure to the fury and violence of the Atlantic gales, and the swift currents and eddies that surround it on every side. In late years, it has been used as a site for the reception and destruction of New York City garbage, and this peculiar industry has brought to the island a considerable-sized population, now about 1,500 in all. The island is not only barren in a physical sense, but until a year ago, it was spiritually a desert, for there was neither church nor Sunday School, and the islanders and their children were absolutely without religious privileges.

Early in 1898, Miss Mattie A. Smith, an earnest Christian woman, of Brooklyn, visited the island, her attention having been called to its needs by some one who had already been there, and who had wondered why a place so near to the great metropolis, and almost under the shadow of the City of Churches, should yet be as devoid of church, school or mission as any part of Central Africa. From the time of Miss Smith's first trip to Barren Island, its spiritual development may be dated. She soon succeeded in enlisting the co-operation of Christian friends in the metropolis, and within a few weeks she established an island Sunday School. This was followed by a regular Young People's Meeting at 7 P.M. Sunday, and by Sunday evening Gospel services and Mother's Meetings on Thursday afternoons. The Sunday School now numbers nearly 200. There is an infant-class, which is held in the sitting-room of a poor neighbor's house, and the little tots sit on the floor and listen, rapt and wide-eyed, to the old sweet Gospel story, as it falls from the teacher's lips.

At first, the task of redeeming Barren Island from its condition of spiritual ignorance seemed appalling, especially to a woman. But soon the missionary got on friendly terms with the island population, and found many ready to heartily cooperate in her work. There were five saloons on the island, and drunkenness was prevalent. Two of these have been closed since the missionary work began. The island police have befriended the missionary and aided her in many ways, the Captain attending and even taking a leading part in the Gospel services on Sunday evenings. Profanity used to be a common evil among the people, even children indulging in the most shocking language. This is now disappearing, and where curses and brawls were common, Gospel hymns may now be heard in island homes. All the services are well attended.

In speaking of her work on Barren Island Miss Smith says: "We expect soon to have a sewing school for children; and also teach them to sing. I have succeeded in getting an organ. My heart was touched when I learned that some of the colored people, of which there are a number, offered to help pay for the organ that they might have the privilege of attending the school. I have announced services for the colored people Sunday mornings, at half past ten, and I hope to open a Bible school for the colored children in one of the homes.

"God prepared the hearts of these people for the Gospel," she added devoutly. "There is a hunger for the Word, which nothing but the Holy Spirit could give. Backsliders, who have not been inside of a church for years, have been graciously reclaimed. Some have stopped swearing, drinking and working on the Lord's Day.

"I formed a reading-room, where men working at the factory could congregate. On the tables I put a few books and secular papers—all I had. Next I brought them Bibles, and some religious literature, and all became deeply interested; but they clamor for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I could only supply them with a couple of copies weekly (a gift of friends). These people are hungry for good reading. Indeed, the whole island has been changed by the Gospel, and I feel sure that the Lord will not allow the work to languish."

THE BARREN ISLAND SUNDAY SCHOOL

Among other plans for the development of this island mission work, a church, to be called the Equintada Chapel, is projected and the corner-stone was laid on May 27 last on two lots presented to the mission by Mr. Byron Whitcomb, of Flatlands. The church will have to be raised on piles, to prevent it being floated at high tide, for, like many other buildings on Barren Island, it will no doubt often be at the mercy of the waves. Miss Smith hopes to secure sufficient funds to carry the church structure forward to completion. She has the utmost confidence that the same Divine influence which opened up a way for the mission work on the island, will supply all that is needed for its continuance.

Our photographs on this page afford an idea of the nature of the work carried on by the pioneer missionary and also give a glimpse of the younger generation of Barren Islanders. The Sabbath School pupils were all assembled in the little school-house, dressed in their best, awaiting the photographer's coming, for the occasion was an event in their lives.

From being thriftless and shiftless, the islanders, under the influence of Gospel teaching and Christian example, are becoming orderly and enterprising. Their homes are cleaner and their faces brighter. They greet the kindly missionary with loving words, as she goes on her way and their hearts go out to her all the more because they know that her work is done without expectation of reward.

The Nachtmahl

Sacrament Day Among the Dutch Boers of the Transvaal

IT is a very touching spectacle, the sight of the Nachtmahl (night meal), held every three months among the Dutch Boers of South Africa. Bloemfontein, though the capital of Orange Free State is closely allied to the Transvaal, its neighbor, by ties of consanguinity, of sympathy, and of soil. The city boasts an English Episcopal church and a Roman Catholic church, and has its bishopric and cathedral. But the pulse of the people beats toward the spire of the large Dutch church in the centre of the town. It stands in the middle of an open square, or park. While the soft, lustrous moonlight of an African night is falling across the gardens and streams of little Bloemfontein; while the "White House"—the residence of the President of the Orange Free State—is lit up with the meetings consequent upon these rumors of war, a curious scene is going on. From the old red-brick farmhouses far across the plains and hills, the farmers and their families have been on the trekk since before dawn, traveling toward the Nachtmahl. To trekk, in South African parlance is to travel in bullock-wagons.

TEACHERS AND PARENTS

From the door-sill of the old Dutch farm-house, the wagons have started. The travelers wave farewell to the orchard, the clumps of willow trees and the gum trees around the old red building, which looks like an oasis in the spacious Veld. The farmer's family wears a serious, wonderful smile upon its lips; they are going onward to the solemn Nachtmahl. The family squeezes itself into the old bullock-wagon.

Now, this bullock-wagon of the Transvaal resembles nothing so much as the poke-bonnet of our great-grandmother of daguerreotype remembrances. Provisions can be stowed away in it for a week. Intelligently driven, the bullock-wagon may make thirty miles a day. As it rolls on, with its lazy but steady gait, it passes through the mountain defile and along the dark ravine, clothed with fir trees, through the silences of the South African hill country. The day begins to wear toward sunset, and the colors across the sky record the crimsons of God, as these simple farmer-folk enter the Dutch town to partake of their great solemnity—the Crimson Chalice of the Nachtmahl. All over the Transvaal to-night, in its little towns, the same touching scene is going on. In the smaller towns, the farmers' families will occupy little clay houses of scant accommodations for a family's comfort; or else outspan on the square itself, around the church's spire.

The "family" that emerges from the bullock-wagon is a quaint one to look upon. The Dutch vrouws wear their Sunday clothes, in the shape of a "rappie" (sunbonnet) and a fine calico gown. The farmer who comes to town for the Nachtmahl wears a yellow jacket, a flannel shirt, brown vest and trousers, and schoen (low shoes). His broad, slouch hat is lined with green. His face is stolid, but shrewd. His whole body expresses splendid physical endurance.

Fires have been kindled all around the church's spire. Groups of these quaint Dutch Boers, men and women, are sitting around the flame, talking of sacred things in the roughest dialect of the world. The solemnity of the Nachtmahl is already on their faces. In the black shadows, the oxen are sleeping, and the little children, too, sleeping beside them. It is all very still.

The Nachtmahl on the morrow, in the old Dutch church, is a very solemn sight. As the bread and the wine are passed around, the tears of unfettered devotion stay upon the rough cheek of the Dutch farmer. The good vrouw is weeping quietly. The children are awed in the sacred silence as they gaze upon it all. The hymn:

"O Sacred Head surrounded
With crown of piercing thorns, . . ."

started by the leader, is taken up in a great wave of devotion that swells through the church. What vows and tears are in its cadences! It unites those shores washed by the Indian Ocean with the home-lands. There is no here, no there! for those who say together "Our Father."

In times of State peril, the Nachtmahl's closing hymn is the Dutch version of the grand old

"Ein' feste Burg is unser Gott."

One may almost hear its echo thunder from those stout old lips along the Transvaal to-night. For the State is on the brink of conflict.

EVERY passing day increases the interest that is felt all over the country in the remarkable discussion now going on in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on the question: "Is a church justified in accepting a gift of money from a saloon-keeper, in aid of its missionary and other spiritual work?" This week, as previously announced, we devote the available space to the letters received from those who hold to the negative side of the discussion. It will be seen that all stations of life and pratically every religious denomination are represented in the letters published below:

W. T. Irons, Alton, Ia., writes:

Our cause is one separate from the world and is strictly pure. God's command to his ancient people was a sacrifice without blemish. Therefore, the church should be free from taking any gift of money from the saloon-keeper and the church will never be spiritually alive and prosperous until it is wholly supported by consecrated means received from consecrated men and women.

W. J. W., Crossville, Ill., writes:

I know of a church which received $100.00 from a saloon-keeper in building their new house, about five years ago, and I believe that church has paid more money to the saloon than they do to their preacher. The preacher says he has often sat on the opposite side of the street and seen his members go in and out of the saloon. He has talked to them about it and preached, but to no purpose, and he is obliged to work at farming and ditching for a living. That saloon man has received his $100.00 back with compound interest.

Elder Joseph Chambers, San Diego, Calif., writes:

My opinion is: God's real church does not accept contaminated social or financial help from the spirit of the world, the flesh or the devil, with his approval. Nothing impure in motive can redeem. His holiness alone does or can save from or destroy sin.

Miss S. J. McG., Medina, O., writes:

I would kindly, but decidedly, decline the proffered gift, for the following reasons: God's people are a peculiar and a holy people, sat apart for his glory (Ex. 19: 5; Deut. 14: 2: 26: 18; Psa. 135: 4; Titus 2: 14; I. Peter 2: 9). As such we have nothing in common with those whose lives are a reproach to God (Matt. 6: 24; I. Cor. 5: 11: 10: 21; Eph. 5: 11; II. Thes. 3: 6, 14). All our offerings to be acceptable, must be without blemish (Lev. 22: 21-25; Deut. 15: 21, 17: 1; Mal. 1: 8, 13, 14). No stranger's offering—that is, one out of Christ—shall be accepted (Ex. 30: 9; Lev. 22: 25; Num. 3: 10: 16: 40; Ezra 4: 1-3; Neh. 2: 20; Psa. 50: 9; Prov. 21: 27: 28: 6). The priest who presumes to offer an unholy offering on God's altar is accursed (Lev. 10: 1-3). But what is directly to the point in this case is, that God has a special curse for the man who puts the bottle to his neighbor's lips (Hab. 2: 15); and his offering is explicitly re-

John W. Ewing, U. S. Treasurer's Office, Washington, D. C., writes:

I would answer no. The Christian church can not in any sense accept contributions from the liquor-saloons and remain true to its exalted station and work of righteousness. 1. Because it would not only be the recipient and beneficiary of "blood-money," but would be guilty of a gross violation of the noble and holy principles of the Christian religion. 2. It would be, in real truth, uniting the pure and holy cause of Christianity to one of the most immoral, degrading, sinful and hell-sanctioned occupations which to-day confronts and antagonizes the elevating trend of Christianity and Christian civilization. 3. Such a relation would be an inexcusable compromise: indeed, it would be a withering calamity to Christ's holy plan of redemption; in fact, it would be a mortal stab to the Christian church, which is the only authorized instrumentality for carrying out our dear Lord's method of salvation. 4. The Christian church should refuse this and all other aid of the devil, not only as a rebuke, but because there is an invaluable principle at stake. Please see Isa. 52: 2; II. Cor. 6: 14-18; Rev. 18: 4, 5. It is the office and absolute duty of the Christian church to not only refuse to be thus unequally yoked to this greatest source of iniquity and prolific cause of intemperance, but she should take a firm stand for God and the Bible, for holiness and

M. A. D., Grosvenordale, Conn., writes:

As to accepting gifts from saloon-keepers for God's work, I would say that I find a most emphatic "No" in a parallel case recorded in Ezra 4: 3, where the chiefs and fathers of Israel reply to the offers made them by the outsiders in these words: "Ye have nothing to do with us to build a house unto our God; but we ourselves together will build unto the Lord God of Israel."

F. G., Philadelphia, Pa., writes:

A saloon-keeper's money is presumably part of the proceeds of his business. The church has again and again denounced this business as a work of the devil and declared to appear legally right. How can the church, after taking this stand, consistently accept part of the saloon-keeper's gains? It simply amounts to saying this: "You are wrong; the curse of God is on your business; you are destroying the bodies and souls of men, etc.—but, notwithstanding, we are willing to share the revenue." If I were a saloon-keeper and a church were to accept my gift and then would dare utter a word of condemnation. I would charge that church with base hypocrisy.

F. J. Schurmann, Lake City, Minn., writes:

No Christian church should touch blood-money; for that is just what saloon money is—wrung out of weak persons for strong drink that eventually leads to the ruin of body and soul.

Mrs. F. I. McC., Sheridan, Mont., writes:

If God is our protector and our defender, why should not we look to him for our support? I think it would be entirely wrong for the devil to be allowed to have any claim upon the church. The saloon-keeper is the follower of Satan and belongs to his realm. If we present a thank-offering to God, without spot or blemish, it must be a consecrated one that God will accept through Christ, not the devil.

D. D. D., Geneva, Fla., writes:

Don't touch it. It is the way that the devil takes to get his foot into the church.

Mrs. Edgar M., Kingston, N. Y., writes:

I am told by men who are called to act as grand jurors that nearly all crimes committed in these times are caused by drinking-beverages that are sold by the saloon. Does not the church represent the home and the nation? and if the saloon is an open enemy to the home and the kingdom of God, how long can the church and nation stand if carried on by

Irving A. C., Gilmanton, N. H., writes:

The saloon is the enemy of the church. Therefore, the saloon-keeper's offer of money to the church is incongruous. Either he is in darkness as to the oppositive nature of church and saloon, or else he has an "axe to grind." He is refusing to accept his gift.

Alfred Lorraine, Buchanan, Mich., writes:

It is merely a bribe. You might as well bauched the nation with their whiskey tax and license bribes, they now propose to debauch the church. God doesn't want the devil's money.

Miss M. B., Ovid, Mich., writes:

God never voted to legalize the saloon business. Do not insult him, then, by offering him the fruits of the devil's own traffic, even though church may have voted on the devil's side of the question. Do not solicit for any purpose from a saloon-keeper. The voting part of the church may have helped the curse to its present dimensions, but do not demand any more of perdition by asking for a part of the spoils.

Cornelius R. Small, Fairmount, Ind., writes:

Inasmuch as the church has the power to annihilate the rum curse, but instead, tolerates it, and that an individual or church is nowhere warranted in doing evil that good may come, a buildeth a town with blood, and establisheth a city by iniquity." If we would take the world for Christ, let us, as a church, go clean-handed.

Grace Morse, Royal Oak, Md., sends this, by way of an answer to J. R. N.'s query:

All honor to Tuft's College, Massachusetts. We learn that the trustees of that institution

Boston brewer, on the ground that to accept it would close the mouth of the college on the temperance question.

Reader, Almoral Station, Iowa, writes:

I answer "no," most emphatically. The church is far too much in touch with the world.

Mrs. G. W. Newell, Central City, Neb.:

I have a house to rent not half a square from a saloon building, and often the keeper or bartender has offered me more rent than I asked for the house, to get it. My invariable answer is: "I consider saloon money blood-money, gained by selling to weak human beings that which destroys the soul as well as the body." Therefore I cannot touch it.

W. O. Smith, Chattanooga, Tenn., writes:

The money made by iniquity can never further Christ's kingdom on earth. See II. Cor. 6: 15: "What concord hath Christ with Belial?" Verse 17: "Touch not the unclean thing," etc. O, church of the living God, be true!

L. B. Trotter, Knoxville, Tenn., writes:

I am surprised that a Christian should have to ask the question. How can we fight the saloon and accept assistance from them for any kind of Christian work? The saloon is an enemy to all that is pure and good, and anything offered by them for any kind of church is only for a bribe.

J. M. Shoemaker, Beverly, O., writes:

Romans 14: 23 will answer J. R. N.'s question. "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." If there comes into my life as a Christian a question of right and wrong, about which I am doubtful, and I continue to act as though it were right, as long as I am doubtful concerning it I am sinning because my action is not of faith. The moment I am doubtful of a certain course of action, my solemn duty is to cease that action.

H. A. Raub, Bucyrus, O., writes:

Accept no gift of money from a saloon keeper to be used for God's cause. He cannot give anything, only for a bribe, and we cannot accept while he is building the devil's kingdom. "Pray earnestly that you be not deceived. God is not mocked." Let every Christian pray God to drive the saloon from our beloved country.

Such money would carry God's curse with it if accepted and used in any way for church purposes. There are unclean things enough in the church to-day without allowing the church itself to touch this unclean thing. The saloon-keeper would laugh in derision, and the world's people in general, for they are always watching for inconsistencies in Christian people. A minister said in my hearing not long since, that he had not any conscience in the matter about using the revenue from the liquor dispensary in South Carolina for the purpose of educating their children. Let the Christian people have a conscience in these matters, which is their bounden duty, and stand firm for their Christian principles and not be turned aside for mere worldly gain.

or support to the whiskey business it is a sin to take it. And if there is any doubt as to the purpose of the gift, we must give the benefit to the church. The real work of the church will stop so long as this Achan is in the camp. The best gift a saloon man can make to the work of the church is to quit his business and to stop voting to perpetuate it.

G. S. Stancliff, Chasm Falls, N. Y., writes:

A man who will run a saloon in this age in Christian America ought not to recognized as a helper in church work. A thousand times no.

Letters opposing the acceptance of the gift have been received from Mrs. J. P. Hillerby, Ill.; W. Purdar, Ark.; S. S. Watkins, Ohio; John F. Templeton, Pa.; R. A. F., Mass.; Mrs. H. G., Kan.; W. · The · Two · Streets ·

TWO streets there are in many towns
A foul one and a fair:
In one, good cheer and peace abound;
In one, a dark despair;
In one, the light of love is shed;
In one, grief's bitter tear;
The name of one of these is "Bread,"
The name of one is "Beer."

In Bread Street there are busy men
And happy homes and wives;
In Beer Street, the degraded den
And sad and broken lives:
In Bread Street, Plenty sings her song
And Labor chants his rhyme;
In Beer street, Want is joined with Wrong
And Idleness with Crime.

O men and mothers, strive to do
All in your power to make
The children shun the ones who brew,
But love the ones who bake!
One street there is their feet should tread,
And one their feet should fear:
The name of one of these is "Bread,"
The name of one is "Beer."

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

COUNTRY HOMES

How to Make Them Attractive - A Frontier Point of View

THE following extracts from an address recently delivered before the Farmers' Congress, Galveston, Texas, by Mrs. S. E. Buchanan, and kindly forwarded by her to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be of none the less interest to our readers because of its strong, local coloring. The hints will be helpful to conscientious home-makers in other sections, as well as those on rolling prairies and Western timber-lands:

"In rustic home life, there is often lack of social pleasures, because of isolation. Young people have not opportunities for recreation, offered in towns and cities; they become restless and wander away. To avoid this, home should bring ample social and intellectual pleasures; should be made so attractive that their love for it may grow with their growth.

"In home-making, an important consideration is healthfulness; another is the cost, which should never exceed one's purse, for however beautiful situation and structure may be, if the builder cannot pay for it, it becomes, instead of a haven of rest and peace, a carking care. Surroundings never should be uninviting, devoid of shade or flowers. From some homes the broad prairie stretches afar from the doorway to the distant horizon, unbroken by fence or tree; monotony relieved only in spring and summer by crops of wheat, corn and cotton, which rarely fail to bless our land; later on, dead, dun fields accentuate desolateness; again, where timbered lands prevail, underbush with tangle and scant shade, give a forlorn and unkept air. Nature clothes prairies and woodlands with thousands of lovely, fragrant flowers, which tended in our gardens, would gladden the eye, and attune the heart to praise of Him, whose bounty gives them to us. Along our streams and in our forests grow noble trees, which may be grouped around our dwellings.

"In its furnishings, home should have the best we can afford. Every art that will serve to adorn should be skilfully employed, though the material used be simple and inexpensive.

"There should be a sunny, cheery sitting or 'mother's' room, where the family may gather, with comfortable chairs, a lounge, made to rest upon, a table upon which good books and periodicals are found; provided with good lights and in winter, a cheerful fire. Music should enter largely into recreations; its influence is restful and elevating and it is often the medium through which the wild and restless boy, disposed to wander, may be kept at home. Bedrooms should be neatly and cozily furnished: dining room and kitchen should receive thoughtful consideration; here, the mother in the dual roll of mistress and maid, must spend much of her life; here the work, which must go on from dawn till dark, is to be done, with its ceasless round of lighting fires, cooking meals, and washing dishes; here the little ones are initiated into the mysteries of domestic work and given first lessons in helpfulness; comforts and conveniences should abound. Pretty, if cheap table-ware, fresh draperies, that need not be of silk or velvet, and inexpensive furnishings made by nimble, loving fingers can give to each room an aspect of beauty and genuine comfort. Many homes are bare of such, not that they are out of reach of the occupants, but because the value and influence of these 'little useless things,' are ignored. The vine clambering over the house graces the rough logs which make its walls; tall trees bending above the lowly roof, shelter it from sun and rain and add a sense of security; so, within, a cozy corner, a bright picture, a well-made bed, a daintily set table, upon which an appetizing, if simple meal is spread, a loving smile, a gentle word, simple things within themselves, together make the charm and joy of home. These are the aesthetics of domestic work and are as necessary to home life as are the material needs of food and raiment. To the young people growing up in the home every legitimate pleasure should be accorded and every inducement to strengthen the ties of home and home pleasures. And they who build wisely will 'look well to the ways of their household,' and see to it that the greed of gain does not quench the love of the beautiful, and that the temporal does not dominate the spiritual."

AUTUMN THOUGHTS

The little children singing in the fields
Of summer-tide ebbing to autumn days
Recall to us our childhood's happy spring,
Set in time's tender, Indian summer haze;
And prophesy to us of heavenly fields
Where, when life's winter into spring shall bloom,
God's servants evermore shall gladsome be,
Like little children, free from care and gloom.

Some Colonial Table Rules

The citation of a few table rules for children, as collaborated in Miss Earle's Home Life in Colonial Days, shows the progress we have made in recognition of child-rights. Children, usually, were to stand, not sit, at table. In some households they stood at a side table, and ran over, trencher in hand, to the big folks' table for their portions. In others, they stood behind their parents, who handed food to them. In some colonial homes, where children might sit at meat, they were to stand until blessing was asked and permission given—which seems wise and mannerly law. "Children must be seen and not heard" was apparently lived up to, for little folks were not to ask for anything on the table. They were not to "look earnestly at another person who was eating," and when "moderately satisfied" must make prompt and orderly exit. Miss Earle writes: "I know of children not fifty years ago, standing at the bountiful table of a Supreme Court Judge," who was a most hospitable entertainer; "each child stood at his own place and had to behave with decorum and eat in entire silence."

One Teacher's Power.

Louise Threete Hodges, a writer and educator says: "Love and kindness are potential agents with most children. A little incident of which I heard regarding a small pupil and her teacher impressed me. A little girl was seated quietly at her mother's side, seemingly engaged in earnest thought. Suddenly looking up, she exclaimed: 'Mamma, Miss ——, calling her teacher's name, 'loves me so much! I wonder what makes her love me so?' This teacher had been signally successful in controlling her classes, seemingly without effort. I had wondered what the secret of her influence over her pupils could be. I wonder no longer."

Victoria at a Festival

The appearance of the aged Queen, surrounded by a number of her children and grandchildren at a lawn party, on the grounds of famous old Carisbrooke Castle, on the heights above the pretty village of Carisbrooke, evoked much interest among our English "cousins." The Queen's daughter, Princess Beatrice, is governor of the Isle of Wight—the second woman governor in the history of the island—and naturally is greatly interested in all that pertains to the pretty little island's welfare. The festival was in aid of funds to restore the outside portion of the handsome parish church in Newport, the corner-stone of which was laid by the Queen's husband in 1854.

Marketing in Cavite

A Kansas soldier, writing from the Philippines, says of his experience during a visit to Cavite:

As we went down the street, Sunday morning appeared to be the market day, for we noticed numbers of native women in front of the markets buying eggs, fish, meats, vegetables, rice, etc. The piece of meat they buy is about the size of one's hand and cut like a steak, and we were told that one of these pieces makes a meal for six or eight people. The women fuss and argue with the Chinamen—who, by the way, have control of the butcher business—as no other women of all the other nations can do. Finally they go away seemingly contented, with their meat in their hands without any wrapping paper on it.

Marketing on the Sabbath is a peculiarity of many Spanish towns—a peculiarity not to be applauded.

Two Little Girls

LITTLE Miss Ready-Girl on the way to school;
Tidy gown and hands and face,
Books and pencils in their place—
She's neat and sweet and cool.

Little Miss Unready-Girl, ne'er in time for school;
Books and pencils out of place,
Towsled hair about her face—
For her, dunce-cap and stool.

Now, whichever will you be,
Little readers dear?
Come quite closely up to me,
Whisper in my ear.

All will be Miss Ready-Girls?
Ah, I thought you would!
Bless your pretty eyes and curls,
Children sweet and good.

"Giant Hands"

MRS. Rosa Leigh, Batesville, Miss., sends us brief but interesting hints concerning a work she is doing among children. The societies of children organized by her have for their name, "The Giant Hands," and for motto, "The giant hands of God help those who help themselves;" and one problem attacked by the "Giant Hands" is: "How to make papa and mamma happy." Of the history and results of the first society organized, Mrs. Leigh says:

"I started July 6, 1898, with young children—only two or three were over twelve. Our regular work is only in summer—although it might be said that the work of the rest of the year is seeing what good reports can be gotten at school. July 8, 1899, we celebrated our first birthday. On this occasion all the cakes were baked by children. Some little girls, five and seven years old, made cake good enough for a wedding. The boys left their parents enjoying the picnic while they made the ice cream. The nice light bread—and in fact, the greater part of the elegant dinner—was prepared and served by the children. After dinner our 'Giant Hand' band was heard advancing, and through the woods our little boys and girls came marching toward us, bearing our country's flag and rendering patriotic music as they led the way to the school chapel. Pictures lined the walk: embroideries, doll dresses, pillow-cases, shirts, trousers, dresses—all the work of children from six years up to fourteen—were displayed. Recitations and music completed the programme of our novel entertainment, the object of which was the making of big folks happy by little ones. One lady, whose son is a member of our society, writes: 'My little boy—whom once I could not keep at home—will hardly go as far as the hen-house now without my permission.'"

Carelessness

Carelessness, proceeding from indifference to one's duty, is an entirely different affair from what seems to be a sort of constitutional infirmity with hundreds of conscientious and useful people, who can not remember where they put things, and who seem unable to carry in their minds details of what they have done or are to do. If you are training a child, use much discrimination. To correct indifference to one's duty, the moral sense must be developed; to cure the other trouble, cultivate, with patience, tenderness, and in a cheerful, hopeful spirit, the child's self-confidence, habits of memory, of system and order. Recognize every advance it makes in these directions, rather than call attention to failures. "I am so sorry," the writer heard a conscientious young lady sigh, "that mamma didn't train me to habits of system and order. When I room with friends with whom it is second nature to have a place for everything and everything in its place, I almost feel that I would give my college course in exchange for such an education."

Cuba in American Eyes

Impressions during a Recent Visit to the Island

By ROBERT STUART MACARTHUR

ALL the social and industrial conditions of Cuba are rapidly improving. With the American possession has come an assurance of the prevalence of law and order, and of peace and prosperity; and, as a consequence, all forms of business are reviving with a rapidity and certainty as gratifying as they are desirable. The devastated haciendas, or plantations, are showing signs of restoration to the prosperity of the most favorable period of the history of the country. Large numbers of cattle are daily landed from ships in the harbor to be sent to different parts of the island. Not fewer, it is said, than 30,000 head of cattle are now contracted for, and will soon be placed on various plantations. The whole spirit of the people is hopeful and their utmost energies are aroused along the lines of industrial endeavor and achievement. The sanitary conditions have improved to a degree surpassing the hopes of even the most enthusiastic Americans. The filth of centuries has been removed from the streets. Spaniards and Cubans alike have had a lesson in cleanliness, and hence of healthfulness, which is as surprising to them as it was necessary to the prosperity of the island. Pavements which had not been seen for generations are now exposed to view, and yards which long were breeding-places of foulest disease, have now been cleansed and fumigated. The whole city has experienced a new life as the result of this regenerative ablution which it has undergone.

THE BROWNING MORRO, AT THE ENTRANCE TO HAVANA HARBOR

It were worth the while of Americans to expend much in treasure and blood, simply to show Spaniards and Cubans the value of sanitation to the success of business and the preservation of life. In laboring thus for the island of Cuba, we are also doing much to preserve the United States from yellow fever and other filth diseases. Cuba has for generations kept parts of our country in a state of chronic alarm. One of the results of our temporary possession will thus bring untold blessings to ourselves as well as to the people of the island of Cuba.

All social conditions are also making marked and favorable progress. Laws have been introduced making marriage valid when performed by proper civil officials or by the ministers of different religious faiths. Under the old regime, the Roman priests were the only persons legally authorized to solemnize the marriage ceremony. In many cases poor Cubans were utterly unable to pay the exorbitant fee which these greedy ecclesiastics demanded. The result was that great numbers of Cubans entered into family relations without any legal marriage ceremony. A similar state of things long existed in Mexico. It is positively affirmed that it would take an average Mexican peon from eight to ten years to save a sum sufficient to pay the priest who should officiate at his marriage. The result was that in Mexico, as in Cuba, the marriage ceremony was dispensed with in great numbers of cases. A new day is dawning morally as well industrially in both these countries; the long night of ecclesiastical tyranny is far spent and the morning of liberty has come.

It is possible that the time has come when we should make arrangements for the redemption of our pledge, both to Cuba and to the world, and withdraw from the island as speedily as possible. We have no desire to violate our solemn pledge in that regard. At the beginning of the war, Congress made its solemn disclaimer not to exercise sovereignty further than to secure the pacification of the island and to establish a stable government. Has that end been attained? That is the real question before us to-day. We have disavowed all intention of annexation, except as it may be desired by Cubans themselves. Pacification is now attained and Cuba, taken as a whole, is as orderly as the United States; the people are docile, obedient, and, as a rule, law-abiding. It is the testimony of all our officials that there is almost no drunkenness and but little lawbreaking of any kind. Is the time near for us to leave Cuba? We must soon decide what course we shall pursue. Are the people capable of governing themselves? That is a question which only time can conclusively answer. If left to themselves, there certainly will be danger of internal revolution, but it seems as if Cuba must make the experiment of establishing a republic.

Candor compels the statement that the Roman Church is in disrepute in Cuba. This is designedly an understatement of the actual facts. It is easy to see how this result is inevitable. The priesthood was almost exclusively composed of Spaniards. If a Cuban became a priest he was sent as speedily as possible to Mexico, Central America, to South America, or somewhere else out of Cuba. It was a settled policy of the Roman Church in Cuba not to run the risk of having Cuban insurgents in the ranks of the priesthood. The church was considered as a department of the government. The priests were mere marrying, christening, and burying machines, as necessary or at least convenient, instruments of social life; and as influential government factors they were tolerated. When war with Spain broke out, many of them abandoned their churches and returned to Spain.

Nominally a Romanist, the Cuban patriot has no religion but patriotism. He is practically an agnostic, and occasionally an avowed atheist. With a superb scorn he speaks of priests and religion as instruments of tyranny and hypocrisy; he sneers at priests as epicene creatures who do not command his respect as manly men or his esteem as moral instructors. The Roman Church has had almost absolute control of Cuba for hundreds of years, and it finds itself now surrounded by openly rebellious and bitterly hostile children. It has not given them public schools nor other facilities for successful competition with Protestant peoples.

There never was a grander opportunity for earnest religious work in any country than is now offered in Cuba. Before all the denominations the hand of God, in marvelous ways, has placed an open door. This door ought speedily to be entered. Plans have already been made by which different denominations can cultivate this great field without encroaching on the territory of one another. Already Methodists, Congregationalists, Episcopalians and Baptists, and perhaps still other denominations, are at work in Havana and in other parts of Cuba.

The writer had the pleasure of preaching on a recent Sunday morning for the Rev. Mr. McDonald, who is conducting services in English in Havana under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. He is earnestly studying Spanish, and hopes soon to be able to preach in that tongue. A devout company, including a goodly number of soldiers and some Cubans, were present at the service that morning. The greatest religious work in the city or on the island is that performed by Rev. Alberto J. Diaz, M.D., under the direction of the Southern Baptist Board. It would be difficult to name a greater religious movement in modern times than that of which God has made him the leader. His history is more like a romance of some great heroic period than the sober narration of a religious experience and enterprise at the close of the nineteenth century. Twice exiled from Cuba, once condemned to be shot, the companion of General Shafter at Santiago, the translator of documents between General Shafter and General Toral in connection with the historic surrender, a physician, a preacher, a pastor and a man of affairs, he stands before the world to-day as the Martin Luther and the John Knox of Cuba.

Great credit is due to Generals Brooke, Ludlow and Lee because of their tactful use of their great military power. To the wives also of these generals should be given due honor for their skill in social matters, in removing antipathy and substituting genuine sympathy between Spaniards, Cubans and Americans.

The influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD along social, patriotic and distinctively religious lines was recognized repeatedly by religious workers in Cuba, in their conversations with this writer.

Whatever the final outcome may be as to the relations between Cuba and the United States, it is certain that the long night of Spanish tyranny and despair is ended, and that the morning of Cuban hope and of American civil and religious liberty has dawned.

Dreyfus Condemned

AS was expected by all who read the proceedings of the Court Martial at Rennes, France, the court, by a vote of five to two, pronounced Capt. Dreyfus guilty and sentenced him to imprisonment for ten years. The five years' imprisonment he has already suffered will count as part of the sentence, so if the decision of the court is allowed to stand, he has five years still to serve.

It must not be thought that this second Court Martial has not been useless. It has achieved a result which to Dreyfus ought to be eminently consoling. It has proved his innocence of the charges brought against him. The whole civilized world, outside of France, having read the evidence, refuses to believe in his guilt. It understands, too, the motives which induced his judges to condemn him. They were officers, sworn to obey the Generals who were his accusers; their whole military training had rendered them subservient to their military superiors, and in the face of the emphatic declaration of those Generals that the prisoner was guilty, they had not the courage to pronounce him innocent. They knew also what the effect of doing justice might be on their own fortunes. An object lesson had been given them in the fate of Colonel Picquart, who for the sole offence of espousing the cause of Dreyfus had been sent on perilous service, then imprisoned, and finally expelled from the army. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that French officers gave the verdict which their superiors demanded. But this is not justice, and it is justice that must be done.

Apart from the fundamental principle of right and wrong, the interests of the Republic are involved. The evidence made it clear that the offence charged against Dreyfus was committed by some one. Esterhazy was the tool used, but he could not have done his traitorous work without the connivance of some officer much higher in the service than himself. Can France afford to have that man still in command? As soon as it is safe he may resume his treachery to his country, and once again we may hear, after some supreme disaster, the cry, "France is betrayed!" For the sake of the national safety, if not for the sake of the national honor, and because of the eternal principles of right and justice, France is bound to probe this matter to the bottom, at any cost. Otherwise the army, of which she is so proud, will rot to the core, the country will be weak in the day when it faces its enemies, and the God of righteousness will again visit the nation in his wrath.

Thus speaketh the Lord of Hosts. Execute true judgment and show mercy and compassion every man to his brother and let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart. But they refused to hearken and pulled away the shoulder and stopped their ears, that they should not hear. Therefore came a great wrath from the Lord of Hosts (Zech. 7: 9-12).

Earnest Belief

"I never read of any men more sincere or more earnest than those priests of Baal at Mount Carmel, those false prophets," writes Mr. D. L. Moody. "They were terribly in earnest.

"Some people say, 'Why, if these men are holding, as you say, error, why should they be so earnest?' Those prophets of Baal were the most earnest men I ever read of. You do not read of men getting so in earnest that they take knives and cut themselves. Look at them leaping upon their altars; hear their cry, 'O Baal! O Baal!' We never hear that kind of prayer now-a-days. They acted like mad men. They were terribly in earnest, yet did God hear their cry? They were all slain.

"Suppose a man said, 'Mr. Moody, I have no faith in you whatever,' don't you think it would grieve me? There is not anything that would wound a man much more than to be told that you do not have any faith in him.

"A great many men say, 'Oh, I have profound reverence and respect for God.' Yes, profound 'respect,' but not 'faith.' Why, it is a downright insult! Suppose a man says, 'Mr. Moody, I have profound respect for you, profound admiration for you, but I do not believe a word you say.' I wouldn't give much for his respect or admiration. I wouldn't give much for his friendship. God wants us to put our faith in him. How it would wound a mother's feelings to hear her children say, 'I do love mamma so much, but I don't believe what she says.' How it would grieve that mother. And that is how many of God's professed children talk."

SODA IN HUMAN BODIES.

A Very Much Needed Worker

Very delicate particles of soda appear in field grains such as used by mankind.

The use made of natural soda or Sodium Sulphate, is to oxidize the sugar in the body thereby decomposing it and making it suitable for rebuilding the cells and preserving the bile and pancreatic juices at normal consistency.

When a person fails to use food containing this important little worker, the sugar in the body is not properly cared for and seeks escape through the kidneys, causing Diabetes. A lack of the Sodium Sulphate is also shown by biliousness, for the bile becomes thick when its little governor is absent. Sodium Sulphate is not readily taken up by the body when given as a drug, but is quickly absorbed when furnished in Nature's way as stored in food, and in that way it is found in Grape Nuts, the most scientifically prepared food made by man. Why? Because in Grape Nuts the pure natural elements needed by man are preserved and presented fresh from Nature's own laboratory.

Domestic Servants

AMELIA E. BARR

A LARGE part of our domestic happiness is dependent upon our domestic service, and yet we take little more account of this "service," than we do of the sun, or the air, or of anything else which it is our heritage to enjoy. If the sun does not shine, we complain; if the air is cold and cutting, we complain; and if we are not served as we wish to be, we also complain: and that without considering what a privilege it is to be served at all, and how much of the comfort of our lives we owe to what we are apt to call its "greatest plagues."

Let us look at the matter in a very common light. We get up in the morning, and find the fire lit and the breakfast spread, the room clean and cheerful, the meat well cooked. We pass from the sleeping chamber to the dining-room, and from the dining-room to the sleeping chamber, and everything is in its right place. Unseen hands have changed disorder into comfort and neatness. All our tastes have been regarded, all our whims consulted. As the day goes on, light, warmth, food and rest are all secured to us without the trouble of stretching out a hand to help ourselves. Yet we are not astonished, we are not even grateful to the agency by which so many comforts are provided for us.

WE are disposed to think—if we think at all on the subject—that we give money for money's worth, and that that is the end of the matter. It is not the end. The servant is doubtless paid for his or her trouble: so is the soldier, and the minister, and the doctor. Are they less worthy of our regard because we pay them for their service? We must bind our domestics to us by some better tie than that of wages.

We will admit that servants are all that they are said to be—that they very seldom have any sense of honor, and that they play the spy at our doors, and do read letters which are not their own. Some of these faults are the natural faults of dependents, and have been inherited through generations of service: others belong to the position, others to their training, or rather their want of training—for it is a fact that household duties are generally regarded as a kind of knowledge, coming by instinct. But all these faults admitted, in what other relationship do we expect to get perfection at twelve dollars a month? In every trade and calling, is not incompetence, rather than efficiency, the rule? How many dressmakers do we try, and have our gowns spoiled? A good dentist is far rarer than a bad one: yea, even the pulpit is not served by a majority of men fit for the office. Our servants, in point of efficiency for their calling, are not worse equipped than our modistes, lawyers, doctors, plumbers, builders, and artisans of many kinds. Good and bad in all of them! In spite of the complaints against the servants of to-day, it can be proved that the great body of them were never more reliable and capable.

THE servant of to-day wants no interference with her private life. She has her own world, her own ideas, her own friends. She does not need to be "directed" or "instructed" or "advised" or "taken-an-interest-in." She feels interference with her dress, or her lovers, or her hours of recreation, to be an impertinence. And this feeling is so just, and so universal, that without "strikes" or "unions," without the influence of either platforms or press, Domestic Service has emancipated itself from all feudal bonds, and gradually put itself on the same plane as mechanical service. Why not? Surely the woman who can cook a good dinner is as important to society as the man who makes the table on which it is served.

Now, we are intelligent enough to understand that the first result of this growing independence is apt to be ignorant self-conceit and over-weening self-importance, showing itself both in offensive manner and speech. They have as yet learned no better way to express their sense of freedom and personal importance. But the better way will come in time: because the placing of service on a commercial basis will sooner or later attract a much higher grade of women.

MANY things have conspired to make the servant of to-day more disrespectful and independent than is quite comfortable to the people who employ them. But these things are the consequences of education and progress, and no good woman would desire to see them altered. Thus, railways have made it easy for them to travel, and if they do not like service in one place, they can for a few dollars go to another. Education also has done its part. Most of our servants can read and write. They are the best patrons of a certain class of newspapers. They read the "want" columns, and can appreciate the lessons they teach, and the advantages they offer. The increase of national wealth has also helped to uplift the servants. People keep larger staffs, and they have individually much less work to do, more time to read, more time to go out and observe. And as a better style of living is also common, servants feel the mental stimulus coming from a richer and more varied diet.

All these things, and others flowing from them, make those who are but partially educated and partially refined, presumptuous and unreasonable, and apt to think too much of themselves. But independence and social freedom step before the fitness for that condition: because the condition is essential for the results: and the results are not realized in one generation. There is besides something provocative of personal assertion in the very air of America. The Irish or Slavonian peasant who has humbly acknowledged his "betters" for half a century without any feeling of wrong, soon learns here that reverence for anything earthly is the most un-American of attitudes—that parents do not exact it, that preachers hardly expect it, and that the very title of Reverend is beginning to be dropped by those who seem to be most worthy of it. Why then should we expect from our servants a respect we do not practice in our own stations?

THERE are a few points which, constantly carried out in every Christian household would quickly revolutionize the servant-girl question.

First: The putting of the contract entirely on a commercial basis. This will make service as honorable as any mechanical, factory or store service, and so attract more sensible and capable women.

Second: Defining absolutely the duties to be performed, and the hours at which service should begin and end. Extra service to receive extra pay.

Third: No personal interference. This of course includes the much-vexed question of "followers." Under the contract indicated the girl would have no more right to have followers when on duty than a carpenter would have to entertain the girl he loved during his eight hours paid work, and a mistress might justly insist that lovers should not interfere with the hours which rightfully belonged to her. But to a kind mistress there would occur many opportunities of lightening this rule, which she would be glad to accept. Every woman wants to be married and to have her own home, however small it may be: and if our cooks and maids share this universal desire, it is no very shameful kicking against our household regulations. A mistress would hardly lose anything by doing in this respect exactly as she would wish to have been done by.

Fourth. If it were possible to enter into yearly engagements, domestic matters would be much more simple and cor- [illegible] the best of each other for a year, they [illegible] and to bear unpleasant things as cheerfully as possible. And bearing soon becomes liking, and the habit of liking is formed: and so month after month passes, and we at least come to feel that the ills we have may be more endurable than those we know nothing about. At any rate, the conditions of service are radically changed. They will never go back: therefore the sooner the new conditions are accepted the sooner we shall receive all the advantages of the new state and bury all the disadvantages of the old one.

A Life Full of Good Deeds

Horace Mather, of Rathbone, N. Y., who passed away on Aug. 22, was a man of far reaching benevolences. His charities, however, were mainly kept private, for he was one who believed that his left hand should not know what his right hand did. Mr. Mather was an exemplary Christian and had a very wide circle of church friends and social acquaintances in his section of the State, who esteemed him highly. He was eighty-three years old at the time of his death.

OUR CHURCH

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Oct. 1. Psalm 122

MANY people are disposed to regard the division of the church of Christ into so many sects as a serious evil. There is no doubt that injury does result from the separation, and that it is not an ideal condition; but there is no reason why it should do the harm that it is charged with. It must not be forgotten that Christ left no model of organization for a church. Had he done so, or had his apostles defined a system of church government, there would be no denominational differences. We must do those who differ from us the justice of believing that they have no desire more earnest than that of conforming their church organization to the will of its divine Founder. We must therefore conclude that the omission of any explicit plan was due to Christ's intention. It would appear that he wished to leave his people free. He prayed that they might be one, but his idea seems to have been a unity of loyalty and love, rather than a uniformity of doctrine and ritual. This belief, of course, is not held by the Church of Rome, which believes that there is no salvation outside its own borders, nor by the Church of England, which teaches that dissent from its organization is a sin. But the evangelical denominations are coming more generally to a spirit of toleration which recognizes every lover of the Lord as a brother.

When we reflect how much birth and early association have to do with our church affiliation, the duty of toleration becomes obvious. Probably less than one-half the members of any one denomination are what they are from a conviction deliberately reasoned out. The majority are doubtless convinced that their own church is right and has the best system of government, but it is a conviction that has come after church connection and is not the cause of it. Besides this, temperament has much to do with the church affiliation. The Methodist would never be happy in a Presbyterian church; nor would the Presbyterian be content in a Protestant Episcopal church. Yet of all the sermons preached in the evangelical churches, there are very few that would not be acceptable to congregations of other names. The fundamental truths of the Gospel, the essentials of faith, love and loyalty to Christ, are common to them all, and each is entitled to a place in the great army of the Christian commonwealth. Each supplies its worshipers with the conditions for spiritual growth and meets the peculiar needs of those individual souls. It is not so much a merging of the denominations that is needed, as a spirit of loving fellowship between the members of the various denominations. "I do not want the fences removed," said one of the denominational leaders recently. "I want them so lowered that I can shake hands over them with members of other faiths."

While therefore we gladly acknowledge the sincerity and fidelity of Christians of other names, we are justified in having a special affection for our own church and an active regard for its welfare and interests. It is our right and our duty to work for the advance of its cause and to increase its membership. This should not be done by proselyting. The man who persuades a Congregationalist to become a Baptist, or the Methodist to become an Episcopalian, has not done a work nearly so gratifying as he who brings as a recruit to a church the man who did not previously belong to any Church. The latter adds another soldier to Christ's army, while the former simply transfers a soldier from one regiment to another. We may legitimately help our own church by making it hospitable and attractive; by giving it our hearty and cordial support; by advocating its claims; by our regular and punctual attendance on its services; by taking care not to quarrel with our fellow-members and trying to reconcile any members who have quarreled with one another; by abstaining from criticism of the pastor; and by earnest prayer for all its institutions and officers. There is also much that may be done by cooperation. Hitherto ground has been lost and money wasted by duplication of organizations. We may help our own church by cordially uniting with other churches in active work instead of holding aloof or insisting on separate action. Above all, we may help by ourselves leading constant, consecrated lives which will commend our church to the world.

The Open Doors

THE Isles of the Sea are waiting now,
And the fields are ready for the Gospel plow.
The call is for laborers to sow the seed
In every land, whatever their creed.
We cannot tell what the harvest will be;
The work is for all—for you and for me.

The Lord of the vineyard will come in time
To gather the harvest from every clime;
The sowers and reapers will have full share
Of the sheaves to be garnered with loving care
For the Master, who calls us to labor and pray,
To rescue souls perishing day by day.

Soldiers of Christ! The command has gone forth:
March to the East, South, West and North!
The banner is lifted; the bugle is heard—
The summons to battle! Gird on your sword;
Our Captain is with you wherever you go,
And the Spirit will aid you to conquer the foe.

Then gather the gold for the work of the Lord—
The treasures of earth were not given to hoard,
But to spread the glad tidings from shore to shore,
Let it cost what it may—ten millions or more—
And hasten the day when Empire and Throne
To His sceptre shall bow, and His kingdom shall own.

Tent-Work in Philadelphia

The Philadelphia summer campaign has proved a decided success. Services were held during the week in five of the tents, and the interest manifested shows the response of the people to these efforts. The attendance at each tent was from 3,000 to 4,000. Meetings for children were held, at which there was an average attendance of 2,000 persons.

Covering all the periods of our country's history from its earliest discovery up to almost the present hour, including every detail of the war with Spain, it is, by the nature of its contents, an encyclopædia, a geography, a treatise on political life and civil government, while its masterful style and literary composition make it a most valuable aid to speaking and writing the English language correctly. No work that has gone before, historical or otherwise, contains anything like the amount of varied and practical knowledge that will be found in this, and it is upon this characteristic, combined with many other excellent features that we depend for its popularity with the people. Help Pouring in for Porto Rico

Many Contributions to the Relief Fund -- A Special Correspondent Describes the Widespread Suffering on the Island

WRECKED BUILDINGS ALONG SHORE AT SAN JUAN

(From Our Special Correspondent)

FROM the circumference to the centre of the island of Porto Rico an appeal arises from almost a million souls for relief. Their condition is worse than the people at home can possibly imagine. The Government and the generous people of the United States have done a great deal to provide for the immediate wants of the starving people, but the work of relief has only begun.

The daily reports received at the headquarters in San Juan from all parts of the island reveal a state of necessity and distress far worse than the conservative dispatches of the Governor-General have indicated. From the interior come the most urgent and distressing appeals from starving people. With the greatest possible energy exercised by the military authorities they are unable, with the supplies and facilities available so far, to reach a vast number of people. Up to the present time something like two million pounds of food, principally rice and beans, have been sent here and distributed.

A conservative estimate of the number of people deprived of labor on account of the storms, and, therefore, of food, would be five hundred thousand—half of the population. The present supplies, if distributed to all of these people equally, would give four pounds to a person—a few days' rations. Besides food, these people need clothing. Wrecked and shattered houses, or huts, must be rebuilt and repaired. Bedding and simple furniture should be provided. The writer has seen hundreds of wretched, homeless people huddled together in the public buildings and churches of the towns; and in the country they creep at night under the ruins of their former roofs. He has seen twelve miles out at sea the floating debris carried by raging rivers from the towns and fields of the interior. Last night a piece of wreckage drifted down the Bayamon river to the sea, bearing upon one end a sorrowful-looking dog, and on the other a peasant's cradle. A few days ago, a traveler returning from Humacao, saw floating upon the sea, near the land, a cottage in which at the early hour of dawn a candle was burning. Such sights as these tell the story of ruin.

Thousands of peons are charges upon the towns in the interior. They have no work. The towns cannot help them for the citizens and merchants have all sustained heavy losses. In many places the towns themselves have been completely wiped out of existence. The coffee, sugar, and tobacco crops have been ruined and the owners of them will not be able for some time to begin the work of repair and restoration. It is true that many of these men can be employed upon the roads, but the amount of work of this character to be done by the government here is limited, because of the want of funds and the stringent economy which is being exercised. The condition of the people now demands the most earnest consideration from the government of the United States and a Christian people.

The task to be performed here is a great one. It needs the earnest and active attention of both the military authorities and civil agencies. The people of Porto Rico have a sublime trust in the American people in this their most trying and last time of need. Once enjoying prosperity under the American flag, they will hereafter be self-reliant and self-supporting. They regard with gratitude the efforts of the President, Secretary Root, THE CHRISIAN HERALD, General Henry and others who have lent their aid to them so generously.

The conditions are regarded with the utmost gravity by the military officers. Colonel Hall, the Adjutant General of the Department of Porto Rico, says that it will require thirty thousand rations daily for months. It is not expected that the War Department can supply this.

It is not to be feared that Porto Rico will be a mendicant ever knocking at the door of the Republic. At this day the emblem of Porto Rico—a lamb bearing the device, Faithful Isle—has a pathetic, if not a prophetic significance. During the centuries of Spain's oppression, the island was submissively faithful. In these first days of our own dominion, the lamb would seem to be a sacrifice.

"For God's sake, help us!" was the agonizing message sent to America by a well-known Porto Rican, after the awful hurricane of the eighth of September. To-day that cry re-echoes through the valleys and along the hillsides as Hunger follows in the wake of Storm, and Despair lays its cold hands upon broken hearts

LONGEVITY

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Ps. 91: 16: . . . . . With long life will I satisfy him

THROUGH the mistake of its friends, religion has been chiefly associated with sick-beds and graveyards. The whole subject, to many people, is odorous with chlorine and carbolic acid. There are people who cannot pronounce the word religion without hearing in it the clipping chisel of the tombstone cutter. It is high time that this thing were changed, and that religion instead of being represented as a hearse to carry out the dead, should be represented as a chariot in which the living are to triumph.

Religion, so far from subtracting from one's vitality, is a glorious addition. It is sanative, curative, hygienic. It is good for the eyes, good for the ears, good for the spleen, good for the digestion, good for the nerves, good for the muscles. When David, in another part of the Psalm, prays that religion may be dominant, he does not speak of it as a mild sickness, or an emaciation, or an attack of moral and spiritual cramp; he speaks of it as "the saving health of all nations"; while God, in the text, promises longevity to the pious, saying: "With long life will I satisfy him." The fact is that men and women die too soon. It is high time that religion joined the hand of medical science in attempting to improve human longevity. Adam lived nine hundred and thirty years. Methuselah lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years. As late in the history of the world as Vespasian, there were, at one time in his empire, forty-five people one hundred and thirty-five years old. So far down as the sixteenth century, Peter Zartan died at one hundred and eighty-five years of age. I do not say that religion will ever take the race back to antediluvian longevity, but I do say the length of life will be increased.

It is said in Isaiah: "The child shall die a hundred years old." Now, if according to Scripture, the child is to be a hundred years old, may not the men and women reach to three hundred and four hundred and five hundred? The fact is that we are mere dwarfs and skeletons compared with some of the generations that are to come. Take the African race. They have been under bondage for centuries. Give them a chance, and they develop a Frederick Douglass or a Toussaint L'Ouverture. And if the white race shall be brought from under the serfdom of sin, what shall be the body? what shall be the soul? Religion has only just touched our world. Give it full power for a few centuries, and who can tell what will be the strength of man, and the beauty of woman, and the longevity of all?

My design is to show that practical religion is the friend of long life. I prove it, first, from the fact that it makes the care of our health a positive Christian duty. Whether we shall keep early or late hours, whether we shall take food digestible or indigestible, whether there shall be thorough or incomplete mastication, are questions very often deferred to the realm of whimsicality; but the Christian man lifts this whole problem of health into the accountable and the divine. He says: "God has given me this body, and he has called it the temple of the Holy Ghost, and to deface its altars, or mar its walls, or crumble its pillars, is a God-defying sacrilege." He sees God's caligraphy in every page—anatomical and physiological. He says: "God has given me a wonderful body for noble purposes." That arm with thirty-two curious bones wielded by forty-six curious muscles, and all under the brain's telegraphy; three hundred and fifty pounds of blood rushing through the heart every hour, the heart in twenty-four hours beating 100,000 times, during the twenty-four hours the lungs taking in fifty-seven hogsheads of air, and all this mechanism not more mighty than delicate and easily disturbed and demolished. The Christian man says to himself: "If I hurt my nerves, if I hurt my brain, if I hurt any of my physical faculties, I insult God and call for dire retribution." Why did God tell the Levites not to offer to him in sacrifice animals imperfect and diseased? He meant to tell us in all the ages that we are to offer to God our very best physical condition, and a man who through irregular or gluttonous eating ruins his health, is not offering to God such a sacrifice. Why did Paul write for his cloak at Troas? Why should such a great man as Paul be anxious about a thing so insignificant as an overcoat? It was because he knew that with pneumonia and rheumatism he would not be worth half as much to God and the Church as with respiration easy and foot free.

An intelligent Christian man would consider it an absurdity to kneel down at night and pray and ask God's protection, while at the same time he kept the windows of his bedroom tight shut against fresh air. He would just as soon think of going out on the bridge between New York and Brooklyn, leaping off and then praying to God to keep him from getting hurt. Just as long as you refer this whole subject of physical health to the realm of whimsicality or to the pastry-cook or to the butcher, or to the baker, or to the apothecary, or to the clothier, you are not acting like a Christian. Take care of all your physicial forces—nervous, muscular, bone, brain, cellular tissue—for all you must be brought to judgment. Smoking your nervous system into fidgets, burning out the coating of your stomach with wine logwooded and strychnined, walking with thin shoes to make your feet look delicate, pinched at the waist until you are nigh cut in two, and neither part worth anything, groaning about sick headache and palpitation of the heart, which you think came from God, when they came from your own folly!

What right has any man or woman to deface the temple of the Holy Ghost? What is the ear? It is the whispering gallery of the soul. What is the eye? It is the observatory God constructed, its telescope sweeping the heavens. What is the hand? An instrument so wonderful that when the Earl of Bridgewater bequeathed in his will $40,000 for treatises to be written on the wisdom, power and goodness of God, Sir Charles Bell, the great English anatomist and surgeon, found his greatest illustration in the construction of the human hand, devoting his whole book to that subject. So wonderful are these bodies that God names his own attributes after different parts of them. His omniscience—it is God's eye. His omnipresence—it is God's ear. His omnipotence—it is God's arm. The upholstery of the midnight heavens—it is the work of God's fingers. His life-giving power—it is the breath of the Almighty. His dominion—"the government shall be upon his shoulder." A body so divinely honored and so divinely constructed, let us be careful not to abuse it. When it becomes a Christian duty to take care of our health, is not the whole tendency toward longevity? If I toss my watch about recklessly, and drop it on the pavement, and wind it up any time of day or night I happen to think of it, and often let it run down, while you are careful with your watch, and never abuse it, and wind it up just at the same hour every night, and put it in a place where it will not suffer from the violent changes of atmosphere, which will last the longer? Common sense answers. Now, the human body is God's watch. You see the hands of the watch, you see the face of the watch; but the beating of the heart is the ticking of the watch. Be careful and do not let it run down!

Again: I remark that practical religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it is a protest against dissipations, which injure and destroy the health. Bad men and women live a very short life. Their sins kill them. I know hundreds of good old men, but I do not know half a dozen bad old men. Why? They do not get old. Lord Byron died at Missolonghi at thirty-six years of age, himself his own Mazeppa, his unbridled passions the horse that dashed with him into the desert. Edgar A. Poe died at Baltimore at thirty-eight years of age. The black raven that alighted on the bust above his door was delirium tremens—

[illegible]

Napoleon Bonaparte lived only just beyond mid-life, then died at St. Helena, and one of his doctors said that his disease was induced by excessive snuffing. The hero of Austerlitz, the man who by one step of his foot in the centre of Europe shook the earth, killed by a snuff-box! How many people we have known who have not lived out half their days because of their dissipations and indulgences! Now, practical religion is a protest against all dissipations of any kind.

"But," you say, "professors of religion have fallen, professors of religion have got drunk, professors of religion have misappropriated trust funds, professors of religion have absconded." Yes; but they threw away their religion before they did their morality. If a man on a White Star line steamer bound for Liverpool, in mid-Atlantic jumps overboard and is drowned, is that anything against the White Star line's capacity to take the man across the ocean? And if a man jumps over the gunwale of his religion and goes down never to rise, is that any reason for your believing that religion has no capacity to take the man clear through? In the one case, if he had kept to the steamer his body would have been saved; in the other case, if he had kept to his religion his morals would have been saved.

There are aged people who would have been dead twenty-five years ago but for the defences and the equipoise of religion. You have no more natural resistance than hundreds of people who lie in the cemeteries to-day, slain by their own vices. The doctors made their case as kind and pleasant as they could, and it was called congestion of the brain, or something else, but the snakes and the blue flies that seemed to crawl over the pillow in the sight of the delirious patient showed what was the matter with him. You, the aged Christian man, walked along by that unhappy one until you came to the golden pillar of a Christian life. You went to the right; he went to the left. That is all the difference between you. If this religion is a protest against all forms of dissipation, then it is an illustrious friend of longevity. "With long life will I satisfy him."

Again: religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it takes the worry out of our temporalities. It is not work that kills men, it is worry. When a man becomes a genuine Christian he makes over to God not only his affections, but his family, his business, his reputation, his body, his mind, his soul—everything. Industrious he will be, but never worrying, because God is managing his affairs. How can he worry about business when in answer to his prayers God tells him when to buy, and when to sell; and if he gain, that is best, and if he lose, that is best.

Suppose you had a supernatural neighbor who came in and said: "Sir, I want you to call on me in every exigency; I am your fast friend. I could fall back on $20,000,000; I can foresee a panic ten years; I hold the controlling stock in thirty of the best monetary institutions of New York; whenever you are in trouble, call on me and I will help you; you can have my money and you can have my influence; here is my hand in pledge for it.' How much would you worry about business? Why, you would say: "I'll do the best I can, and then I'll depend on my friend's generosity for the rest.

Now more than that is promised to every Christian business man. God says to him: "I own New York and London and St. Petersburg and Pekin; and Australia and California are mine; I can foresee a panic a hundred years; I have all the resources of the universe, and I am your fast friend; when you get in business trouble or any other trouble, call on me, and I will help; here is my hand in pledge of omnipotent deliverance." How much should that man worry? Not much. What lion will dare to put his paw on that Daniel? Is there not rest in this? Is there not an eternal vacation in this? "Oh," you say, "there is a man who asked God for a blessing in a certain enterprise, and he lost five thousand dollars in it. Explain that." I will. Yonder is a factory, and one wheel is going north, and the other wheel is going south, and one wheel plays laterally and the other plays vertically. I go to the manufacturer and I say: "O, manufacturer, your machinery is a contradiction. Why do you not make all the wheels go one way?" "Well," he says, "I made them to go in opposite directions on purpose, and they produce the right result. You go down-stairs and examine the carpets we are turning out in this establishment and you will see." I go down on the other floor and I see the carpets, and I am obliged to confess that though the wheels in that factory go in opposite directions, they turn out a beautiful result: and while I am standing there looking at the exquisite fabric an old Scripture passage comes into my mind: "All things work together for good to them who love God." Is there not a tonic in that? Is there not longevity in that?

Suppose a man is all the time worried about his reputation? One man says he lies, another says he is stupid, another says he is dishonest, and half a dozen printing establishments attack him, and he is in a great state of excitement and worry and fume, and cannot sleep; but religion comes to him and says, "Man! God is on your side; he will take care of your reputation; if God be for you, who can be against you?" How much should that man worry about his reputation? Not much. If that broker who some years ago in Wall Street, after he had lost money, sat down and wrote a farewell letter to his wife before he blew his brains out, if instead of taking out of his pocket a pistol he had taken out a well-read New Testament, there would have been one less suicide.

O nervous and feverish people of the world, try this almighty sedative. You will live twenty-five years longer under its soothing power. It is not chloral that you want, or morphine that you want: it is the gospel of Jesus Christ. "With long life will I satisfy him."

Again: practical religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it removes all corroding care about a future existence. Every man wants to know what is to become of him. If you get on board a railtrain, you want to know at what depot it is going to stop; if you get on board a ship, you want to know into what harbor it is going to run, and if you should tell me you have no interest in what is to be your future destiny, I would, in as polite a way as I know how, tell you I did not believe you. Before I had this matter settled with reference to my future existence the question almost worried me into ruined health. The anxieties men have upon this subject put together would make a martyrdom. This is a state of awful unhealthiness. There are people who fret themselves to death for fear of dying. I want to take the strain off your nerves and the depression off your soul, and I make two or three experiments. Experiment first: When you go out of this world it does not make any difference whether you have been good or bad, whether you believed truth or error, you will go straight to glory. "Impossible," you say; "my common sense as well as my religion teaches that the bad and the good cannot live together forever. You give me no comfort in that experiment." Experiment the second: When you leave this world you will go into an intermediate state where you can get converted and prepared for heaven. "Impossible," you say; "as the tree falleth, so must it lie, and I cannot postpone to an intermediate state reformation which ought to have been effected in this state." Experiment the third: There is no future world; when a man dies, that is the last of him. Do not worry about what you are to do in another state of being; you will not do anything. "Impossible," you say; "there is something that tells me that death is not the appendix, but the preface to life; there is something that tells me that on this side of the grave I only get started, and that I shall go on forever; my power to think says 'forever,' my affections say 'forever,' my capacity to enjoy or suffer, 'forever.'"

Well, you defeat me in my three experiments. I have only one more to make, and if you defeat me in that I am exhausted: A mighty One on a knoll back of Jerusalem one day, the skies filled with forked lightnings and the earth filled with volcanic disturbances, turned his pale and agonized face toward the heavens and said: "I take the sins and sorrows of the ages into my own heart. I am the expiation. Witness earth and heaven and hell, I am the expiation." And the hammer struck him, and the spears punctured him, and heaven thundered: "The wages of sin is death!" "The soul that sinneth, it shall die!" "I will by no means clear the guilty!" Then there was silence for half an hour, and the lightnings were drawn back into the scabbard of the sky, and the earth ceased to quiver, and all the colors of the sky began to shift into a rainbow woven out of the falling tears of Jesus, and there was red as of the bloodshedding, and there was blue as of the bruising, and there was green as of the heavenly foliage, and there was orange as of the day dawn. And along the line of the blue I saw the words: "I was bruised for their iniquities." And along the line of the red I saw the words: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." And along the line of the green I saw the words: "The leaves of the Tree of Life for the healing of the nations." And along the line of the orange I saw the words: "The day-spring from on high hath visited us." And then I saw the storm was over, and the rainbow rose higher and higher until it seemed retreating to another heaven, and planting one column of its colors on one side the eternal hill, and planting the other column of its colors on the other side the eternal hill, it rose upward and upward, "and behold there was a rainbow about the throne." Accept that sacrifice and quit worrying. Take the tonic, the inspiration, the longevity of this truth.

Glory be to God for this robust, healthy religion. It will have a tendency to make you live long in this world, and in the world to come you will have eternal life. "With long life will I satisfy him."

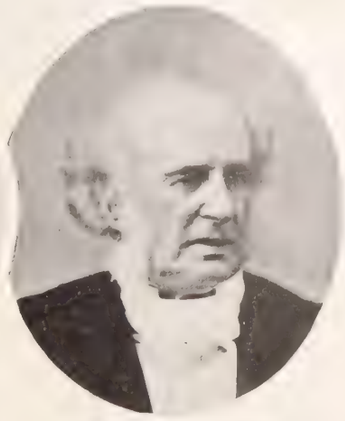
Vanderbilt Philanthropies

Cornelius Vanderbilt, Railroad Magnate and Philanthropist—Friend of Young Men

THE recent death of Cornelius Vanderbilt was cause of deep regret, not only in his family and among his friends, but among many people in humble walks of life, and especially to "railroad boys." Mr. Vanderbilt was a millionaire who did good in the world. In these days of colossal fortunes, many of which have been accumulated as the result of purely speculative gambling or of undertakings that have impoverished widows and orphans, depreciated the products of the farm, wrecked railroads and other large industrial enterprises and cornered the food-stuffs of the world, it is pleasing to reflect that the Vanderbilt millions were honestly made, as well as generously employed. The original basis of Cornelius Vanderbilt's enormous wealth—between $125,000,000 and $150,000,000—was his inheritance from his grandfather, the old "Commodore," an inheritance enlarged by his own extraordinary energy and enterprise. The heads of the Vanderbilt house have been workers from the Commodore, who rowed his boatload of cabbages from Staten Island to the Battery, to the man just dead, who began life as a farmer's son, doing the ordinary chores incidental to such a life, and who made his first wages as messenger in a New York banking house. His grandfather used to say of him: "That boy I can trust. I can tell him something to do, and never have to think of it again. I know that he will do it."

The life of Mr. Vanderbilt has been very fully told by the secular press, and it is solely to that side of his character in which he allowed his philanthropic nature fullest activity and expansion that this article will be confined.

THE LATE CORNELIUS VANDERBILT



COMMODORE VANDERBILT

A complete list of his gifts to organized forms of charity, to churches, and to educational and philanthropic enterprises is hardly obtainable, so numerous and widely distributed were they. Besides, he shrank from having his good deeds proclaimed, liking to do his alms literally according to the old command, "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth," and his benefactions revealed themselves because of a magnitude that could not be hidden. The individual cases of distress he relieved, it is impossible to compute. Among institutions to which he lent his support as active and heavy contributor may be mentioned St. Luke's Hospital, the Vanderbilt Clinic, Sloane Maternity, Hospital for the Relief of the Ruptured and Crippled, Home for Incurables, Eye and Ear Infirmary, New York Christian Home for Intemperate Men, Hospital Saturday and Sunday Association, the Improved Dwelling Association, Seamen's Missionary Society, International Medical Missionary Society, Domestic and Foreign Mission of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Society of St. Johnland, St. Bartholomew's Mission, and every branch of the Young Men's Christian Association and particularly to the one created for the benefit of railroad men. He was trustee to the General Theological Seminary; trustee (and contributor of $100,000) to the new Protestant Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine; donor of $100,000 to Columbia College; and with his wife, his earnest sympathizer and coadjutor in all good works, giver of a million-dollar dormitory to Yale.

The work which perhaps commanded his largest and most enthusiastic activity, was that of the Young Men's Christian Association. The Bowery branch, the Institute branch, and the handsome Fifty-Seventh street building (on ground purchased by his father's legacy) all profited by large benefactions. He was an active member of the International Committee, and spent time, money and talent unstintedly on city, state and continental work. In the railroad branch, of which he was President, he was a pioneer. Desire to throw safeguards around railroad men and save them from temptations of saloon and pool-rooms, stimulated an interest which became instrumental in the extension and expansion of this work along railway lines in many States. The handsome home of the R.Y.M.C.A., near the Grand Central station, built at a cost of over $200,000, he sometimes spoke of as his "monument." He instituted a pension fund for worthy employees, and one of his last acts was to write a letter directing relief of a railroad man's destitute widow. His fixed annual contribution to Y. M. C. A. work aggregated many thousands, and he was ever enlarging it to meet new calls and unexpected difficulties.

Thousands are familiar with the splendid work done for the East Side poor at St. Bartholomew's Parish House. The handsome building and the ground it covers, were given by Mr. Vanderbilt, his wife, and mother, who was a clergyman's daughter. He was buried from St. Bartholomew's Church, of which he had been a member and vestryman for many years.

Haman's Plot Against the Jews

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 8 Esther 3: 1-11
Golden Text, Romans 8: 31

THE world has never loved the Jews. Again and again the fear of the Jews has fallen upon the children of this world, as he promised them it should be if they would hearken to and obey him (Exod. 23: 27); but the "carnal mind" of man is always "enmity against God" (Rom. 8: 7), and therefore against his people. The world always hates the idea of separation. Because Israel was called to be a separate people, the world has been against them. Deeply and repeatedly have the Jews fallen; again and again has judgment come upon them for their sins; but God has never "cast away his people whom he foreknew" (Rom. 11: 1, 2), and he never will. After the return of some 50,000 Jews from Babylonia, at the end of the seventy years' captivity, many Jews still remained behind, and one of these was Mordecai, whose cousin and adopted daughter, Esther, was now the chosen queen of Ahasuerus, or Xerxes, the then king of Persia. The king himself did not know that his queen was Jewish. Esther had not only captivated him, but had won favor with all who knew her (Esther 2: 9, 15, 17). But Esther, like every true child of God, must be put to the proof, and because of her high position and responsibility, she must pass through special tests. It is more than probable that Esther exercised a certain influence over the king, which would certainly be for good; and the enemy of souls, seeing this, had his own plan of counteracting it, by putting in the way of this great king an insidious flatterer, Haman the Agagite, perhaps one of the posterity of that very Agag, the Amalekitish king who, with his people, Saul had failed to destroy.

Haman obtained a great ascendency over the king, and he set his seat above all the princes that were with him (Esther 3: 1); and the king's servants consequently obeyed the royal command to bow down to him and do him reverence. There was one exception, and this was a Jew, probably the most honest and loyal man among them; it was Mordecai. The king owed his life to this man, for he had discovered, and warned the king through Esther the queen, of a conspiracy against his life. If the Jew had had his rights, and the king had rewarded deeds rather than words, the Jew would have been in the place which Haman now occupied. But a man who knows God can wait; and patiently Mordecai waited on until God should take up his cause. The cause of God's people is his cause. "He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye" (Zech. 2: 8).

Thus, trusting in his God, Mordecai would not sin against his own conscience in bowing down to a man who was personally unworthy. God's cause was Mordecai's; how then should he bow down before this Agagite without dishonoring his God? He knew the risk he was running, but he knew it was safe to trust God. The king's servants were quick to remark the attitude of the Jew; and after enquiring of him, "Why transgressest thou the king's commandment?" to which he gave them no reply, they busied themselves in drawing Haman's attention to the unbending Jew, to see whether Mordecai's matters would stand, for he had told them that he was a Jew. Perhaps some of the envy and rancor which Daniel's promotion had caused remained among the courtiers. To them it was an unequal contest between two men, but Mordecai, who had his people upon his heart, saw involved the cause of his people's God.

The wrath of Haman was aroused, and the man showed himself in his true colors. He watched the Jew; and when he saw that he made no sign of reverence before him, a deadly hatred of Mordecai took possession of him; and the enemy of souls, whose servant he was, urged him on to a diabolical vengeance, not only against the man who would not do him undeserved honor, but against all his people. The only and unenviable notoriety of Haman was, like that of the present Sultan of Turkey, in his gigantic plans for murdering the people of God. Haman, in his subtlety, did not mention the real cause for which he sought the destruction of the Jews; he, to appear disinterested, put it on quite another ground: their laws were different from all people, and they kept not the king's laws, such was his indictment. It was of the same order as the chief priest's accusation of Jesus, only a pretext without justice or reason; both came from the same source: one can recognize in both the inspiration of the enemy.

"ALL THE KING'S SERVANTS . . . BOWED . . . BUT MORDECAI BOWED NOT"

The unsuspecting king fell into the snare; he gave his ring to Haman, the Jews' enemy, with the words, "The silver is given to thee, the people also, to do with them as it seemeth good to thee"; and every Jew in his great empire, and all their property, was placed at the mercy of this bloodthirsty man. So it seemed. But the man who had been used of God to save the king's life was to be used of God to save his people's lives also. Haman lost no time; for the moment he was supreme, and all the machinery of the government was put in motion by him for the complete extirpation of the Jews, and the confiscation of all their property, to take place at the end of the year. "And the king and Haman sat down to drink; but the city of Shushan was perplexed." The Jews had done nothing to deserve such treatment. Why were they to die? The triumph of the wicked is short. There were mightier agencies at work than Haman dreamed of, and the hosts of wickedness which were behind him, and into whose hands he was playing, trembled, for they do believe (James 2: 19), but Haman neither believed nor trembled.

Men who have faith in God can afford to let things come to extremities. Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego knew well what would be the consequence of their refusal to worship the golden image, and so did Daniel know of the consequences of his persistency in worshiping the true and living God. And Mordecai, knowing well that Ahasuerus was so under the influence of Haman, that no human power could deliver either him or his people, had nevertheless an unfailing source. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" (Rom. 8: 31).

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

WHILE the Jews who had returned to Jerusalem were contending with their enemies, trying to bring order out of chaos, attending the services in their recently completed Temple, and wandering among the ruins of the walls of the city, their brethren, whom they had left behind in Babylon and other cities of the unwieldy Persian empire, were beset by a new and unlooked-for peril. So silent are the secular historians about this trouble that scholars in our own day have suggested that the strange story as it is related in the book of Esther is a pure romance. Luther, himself, ardent as he was in his reverence for the Bible, declared that he would have been glad if it had contained no such book as Esther, which he regarded as useless, if not mischievous. The Jews, however, most certainly believed the book to be veritable history, and to this day they commemorate, by a holiday and a feast, the events it records. Although some of the events appear improbable, and there are difficulties in reconciling its story with known facts, there is no good reason for regarding it as apocryphal. The language of the book, the incidental allusions to Persian customs, the insight it shows of the character of the king, and the sketch it draws of court life, all prove that it was written by some one familiar with life in the Persian capital near the period described. It must also be perceived that if it had been a pure romance, the writer would have been likely to make his work more in accord with other Jewish literature, whereas it occupies a place by itself dissimilar from other productions of Jewish pens. The name of God does not occur in the whole book, and there is no reference to religion in it. In the time of the greatest peril and suspense when we should expect every Jew to be entreating God's interference on behalf of the people, there is no sign that they prayed, and the writer records only that they fasted. The only sign of recognition of God that he gives is the vague remark of Mordecai, that if Esther would not help in the crisis, help would come "from another place." It is certainly astonishing to find among a literature so saturated with religion, as is the Jewish, a book ignoring it so completely as does the book of Esther. It would seem that if an author had been writing fiction and not cold facts, he would not have made his book so unique as this. Scholars have no difficulty in identifying the king, whom our author calls Ahasuerus. His name is Xerxes, the Persian king who led his huge army into Greece and was defeated at Salamis. All that is recorded in secular history makes this story of the book of Esther consistent. Xerxes would have been very likely to act in his court as Ahasuerus is described as acting in Shushan. There is more difficulty in identifying Vashti and Esther. Xerxes had a wife named Amestris, but in the seventh year of his reign, when Esther is said to have been made his queen, Amestris had already borne her husband two sons, who had grown to man's estate and were married. Besides, Amestris was never divorced, and she outlived her husband, so she cannot be identified with either Vashti or Esther. But that fact constitutes no real difficulty in view of the habits of Oriental sultans in general, and Xerxes in particular. The place in the history of the Jewish people, to which the story belongs, is clearly indicated. It is sixty-two years after Zerubbabel led the first return of his countrymen to Palestine under the edict of Cyrus, and sixteen years before Ezra's return under Artaxerxes.

The Agagite. This was evidently a term of opprobrium. The new Grand Vizier was an enemy of the Jews, as hateful to them as Agag had been (I. Sam. 15: 32). When the book of Esther was translated into Greek, the translator called Haman, the Macedonian, because just then the Macedonians were the typical enemies of the Jews. So, though Haman had not the remotest connection with Agag, the Amalekite, he stands pilloried in the history as an Agagite. History revenges the wrongs of the oppressed. The name of Catherine de Medici can never be mentioned without recalling the memory of the massacre of the Huguenots, and so with other famous murderers and high-placed plotters, their names go down from one generation to another as synonyms for cruelty.

Mordecai bowed not. Mordecai held some subordinate place about the court and would naturally be expected to show respect for the highest officer in the empire. It would seem, however, that this bowing was a prostration which implied worship. Mordecai's religious scruples must have been involved, otherwise he would never take a course so certain to bring danger upon him. A well-known writer in putting in striking contrast the character of two of his personages, describes an argument between them on the propriety of taking off the hat on meeting a certain social magnate. "I should do it," says one, "as a matter of courtesy and respect. He expects my homage, and it saves trouble to give it. I care nothing for the man, but it is not any trouble to lift my hat to him." The other replied, "Have you never heard of such a thing as principle?" Mordecai's principles stood in the way. It is not any trouble to lift the hat, but when it implies worship, it becomes serious. Many a man has been ill-treated and in danger of his life in Roman Catholic countries, because he would not uncover his head when the host was being carried in procession through the streets.

They told Haman. There are always mischief-makers around who enjoy causing quarrels. One wonders whether some of these officious creatures, who called Haman's attention to Mordecai's conduct, paid the penalty of their chattering tongues in the subsequent massacre. It is very likely, for they were evidently people about the court, and there the slaughter was great. Eight hundred men in all were killed by the Jews in Shushan alone, and among them were probably some of those who started the trouble. In the French Revolution, at the close of the eighteenth century, the people who did the most mischief were those who went to the courts to denounce their neighbors. Many a noble man and woman would have escaped the guillotine but for these officious people. It is worthy of note that nearly all of those who thus made themselves busy, themselves were denounced, and perished like their victims. A tale-bearer's words, as Solomon says, are as wounds.

THE GOSPEL IN NOVA SCOTIA

A Notable Gathering of Gospel Workers in "Evangeline's Country"

BAY VIEW PARK, WHERE THE CONFERENCE WAS HELD

THE Maritime Conference for Christian workers, recently held in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, was an occasion of unusual interest. It was largely attended by people from the United States and from the interior and maritime provinces of Canada; and England was represented by clergymen present. United States workers were in particularly abundant evidence; among those well known were Rev. Dr. A. T. Pierson, of Brooklyn, leader of the Conference, Rev. Dr. R. A. Torrey, Supt. of Moody's Bible Institute, Chicago, Rev. Charles E. Hulburt, of Philadelphia, Rev. W. H. Palmer, of Providence, R. I., and Rev. Mr. H. B. Gibbud the rescue missionary worker. One of the results of the Conference is the inauguration in Yarmouth by Mr. Gibbud of a training school for Christian workers.

The address welcoming the visiting brethren was made Tuesday, Aug. 29, in Zion Church, by Rev. Dr. E. D. Millar, in the name of the Churches of Nova Scotia. On the previous Sabbath and on Sundays in September during the Conference, the pulpits of Yarmouth and neighboring hamlets were occupied by visiting ministers. The early morning prayer-meetings in St. John's Presbyterian Church, were interesting features of the Conference; the first was lead by Dr. Torrey, and later ones by Rev. Mr. Hulburt. Forenoon sessions were given chiefly to Bible study; afternoon meetings to consideration of various methods of Christian work; and among the speakers at these were Rev. R. P. McKim, of St. John, New Brunswick, and Evangelist Gale. Miss Ella D. McLarren, from the foreign field, gave instructive accounts of the labors, hardships and opportunities of workers in heathen lands "where the homeliest duties of life, the woodman's axe and the needle of Dorcas may be used in Divine enterprise." Many sermons were given on "Prayer;" the wonders wrought in the life of George Muller, and the establishment of his orphanages were cited as illustrations of the power of prayer. "The Holy Spirit," "The Power of the Bible," and "Acquaintance with God" were other topics of evangelical discourses. The singing was under direction of Evangelist W. S. Martin. Open-air meetings were held in front of the post office, at the Coast Railway station and other places. While the regular evening services were usually at some church in Yarmouth, the morning and afternoon sessions were held at Bay View Park, through the hospitality of the owner, Hon. L. E. Baker, President of the Yarmouth S. S. Co., a gentleman who is in hearty accord with evangelical Christian work, and who lends his labor and influence to many humanitarian and religious enterprises. He is a liberal contributor to Yarmouth's excellent Old Ladies' Home, and the public library is his gift. On the stanch ship Yarmouth the writer was interested to note that the evening's music was of a sacred character. The saloon or "social hall" made a quaint and homelike picture, with the piano in the center, and members of the ship's company and passengers sitting and standing around, singing sweet old Gospel songs, and contributing in various little acts of courtesy and kindness to the appearance of a family circle. On deck a little group of young lads and lassies had been observed singing; and once mariners on any passing ship might have heard these beautiful words of Charles Wesley floating over the waves:

Throughout the deep thy footsteps shine.
The prosperous and pretty town little steamer plies back and forth hourly.

Nova Scotia is a place of kind hearts and generous hands, ever ready to extend cordial welcome to brothers from "the States," large numbers of whom yearly seek its pleasant shores in the summer months. The representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was made to feel more than at home, on ship and ashore. Especially was this the case when readers of the paper gave the warm greeting of old friends. Particularly, too, was it so when a lady exclaimed: "Tell us about the Children's Home. I have a friend at Nyack, who writes me about that beautiful work!"

of Yarmouth, next to Halifax in population, is of particular interest as being the nearest gateway for people of the United States to quaint and beautiful Nova Scotia, the "Acadie" of Longfellow's poem, "Evangeline." A day's journey from Yarmouth is Grand Pre, once the home of Evangeline. A considerable number of Micmac Indians—the island's early possessors—are still included in its population; and here and there, over streams abounding in fish, the Micmac's canoe still glides; and here and there his tent is pitched as of old, although, for the most part, he lives in houses and is civilized and Christianized. Hundreds of years before Columbus discovered America, Northern Europeans, it is claimed, must have visited the spot where Yarmouth now stands, as the inscription in dotted runes on the old Norse stone (which anybody in Yarmouth will show you) testifies; but they did not bide; and about 1761, Massachusetts men, Sealed Landers, Consider Fuller and others settled here; and the town is one of strong New England characteristics. Although numbering only some 10,000 population, it is a place of many churches; it maintains a high grade of morality and temperance. Bay View Park is just across the harbor from the pretty, picturesque town, and a

A Christian Medical Missionary Assaulted in Persia

DR. Jesse Malik Yonan, a native of Persia, educated in an American medical college and a naturalized citizen of this country, recently returned to Persia. Dr. Yonan is a Christian medical missionary, and many of our readers are already acquainted with his work, having read his letters in these pages. He comes of a Christian family in Persia, which has suffered persecution for the faith.

In a letter just received from Dr. Yonan, dated at Urmiah, July 24, he gives an account of a murderous attack recently made upon him by a fanatical Mohammedan mob. He writes:

"I am just recovering from the effects of an outrage. Last Wednesday, at 5 p. m., I was going together with my servant to dress the leg of a Moslem nobleman (I had amputated it a few days before). To reach his house, I had to cross through one of the toughest parts of the city, inhabited by Sayids (descendants of the Imams). We were passing through the graveyard, which is also the pathway, when a boy of fifteen stood in front, and reviled my religion and the Cross in an awful way. I tried to get rid of the fellow, but did not succeed, and he cried aloud, saying, 'The infidel has killed me.' In an instant I found myself surrounded by a mob. I asked them what I had done, but they would not listen and said I had reviled the Mohammedan faith. I asked, 'Who heard me revile it?' All of them cried, 'I did! I did!' (It is a righteous deed to give false witness against a Christian). They began to beat me with heavy sticks. The mob was increasing, and I was left in their midst like a foot-ball. My servant fled to inform the authorities. Then the mob dragged me in the streets for a long distance, and finally took me to the house of a Sayid prominent in the history of outrages on Christians. Two men ran to the Moslem priest to inform him of the prey they had. A number of these false witnesses told the most outrageous lies, asserting things I had never done."

Fortunately the news came to the ears of the Governor, who had been a patient of Dr. Yonan, and the life of the Christian, which had been at the mercy of the cruel mob, was saved.

Buried Cities Discovered

One of the most distinguished and determined explorers of to-day, is Dr. Sven Anders Hedin, son of Ludwig Hedin, chief architect of Stockholm. He has journeyed through Persia and Mesopotamia, explored Khorasan and Turkestan, and his last and most celebrated expedition was exploring the wastes of Central Asia and the supposed sites of buried cities. While traveling in the waterless Asiatic deserts of Taklamakam (known as "the sand that slayeth"), he had many narrow escapes from death. He discovered in the great desert the remains of buried cities of a date preceding the Mohammedan conquest, and evidently in an advanced state of civilization, presumably Buddhist. In recognition of his contribution to geographical science, the King of Sweden presented Dr. Hedin with the Order of the North Star, and he also received the gold medal of the Royal Geographical Society.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,

Degradation of France

THE civilized world was insulted when the judges in the French court-room convicted Dreyfus on his second trial, which was no trial at all. The nations have stood aghast at the outlawry and ruffianism of the French court-room. Such goings-on of lawyers and witnesses and judges were unprecedented. We see now that it was as thoroughly decided that Dreyfus should be condemned before the case was opened as at its close. The witnesses against the prisoner were allowed to make stump speeches. The attorneys for the defence were indecorously ordered to sit down. The whole scene at times became a bedlam and a riot. The result reached is a moral disaster and a national disgrace. We pity France more than we pity Dreyfus. Human life is short at the longest, but nations have a life of centuries. The wrong to the individual ends in four or five decades, but a national wrong hurts many generations. We still hope through a pardon by President Loubet and through some outside help, or through some strategic escape from endungeonment Dreyfus may soon be free.

There will be no peace in France till he is free. Such a barbarism will somehow be avenged, and the right will triumph. Meanwhile, the sword of France which has been a brilliant sword, the sword of Lafayette and Bonaparte and Marshal Ney is a bespattered sword. The military in their court-martial did this. Spain sank last year to a low level, and France this year sinks quite as low. The President of France by one stroke of his pen can do much to redeem his nation. May eternal justice move him to do the right thing! But the proposed retaliation on the part of other nations by withholding support of the French Exposition next year is a gigantic unwisdom. Such boycotting would be of the devil and would do no good. Such absentation would chiefly punish those who are not to blame. Blot out the Centennial Fair at Paris, and the officers of the French Army who struck down Dreyfus would nevertheless get their pay. The merchants and artists and mechanics and manufacturers of all civilized nations would feel the damage of such retaliation. The hundreds of thousands of dollars voted by Congress for the favorable presentation of American fabrics, and American invention, and American products would be wasted.

The spirit of revenge and bad feeling would be fostered, and the spirit of goodwill buffeted and driven back. No! No! It will be an advantage to all the world to have the exposition at Paris a great success. Let not the malevolence of a perfidious court-martial impede the world's progress. The only way to war successfully against such ignominy as that enacted by the court-martial at Rennes, France, is by establishing complete fairness in our own court-martials, by the illustrious behavior of judges who never disgrace their robes, by annihilation in this country of race-prejudice, by more vehement denunciation by printing-press, and platform, and pulpit of all injustice against Jew, and Gentile, against white, and black, against any race or nationality.

As to where this agitation will end, no one can make any valuable prophecy. Something unexpected will happen. An event will come in upon the French capital as radical, as overpowering as when, on the 2d of December, 1851, Napoleon III. and his escort rode through the Champs Elysee, and constitutional government went down under the hoofs of their horses. The victors in this conflict in the French court-martial are celebrating their Austerlitz. But let them remember that after Austerlitz came Waterloo.

The hero of that scandalous court-room at Rennes, France, was M. Labori. The bullet lodged in his body only made him more earnest and determined and magnificent. Neither Edmund Burke, nor Daniel O'Connell, nor Lord Broughham, nor Rufus Choate, nor Charles O'Conor ever appeared grander in any court-room. This mighty French lawyer brought forensic eloquence to coronation. As long as innocence is to be defended, and righteousness vindicated, and injustice arraigned, and iniquity assailed, and the splendors of great oratory kindled, the name of M. Labori will be honored.

But poor Dreyfus! he has been sacrificed. It is not a question whether he shall suffer. He has already endured martyrdom. The freshest breezes that will ever blow over France cannot give him back steady nerves and mental health. The world can never undo the wrong it has done him. Disimprisonment and restoration to his home, and years of quietude, and plenty, cannot atone for the agony of the last five years.

As we go to press with this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the news comes by cable that Dreyfus has been pardoned, and will immediately be set at liberty.

Significant American Expansion

A SHIP has just sailed from these shores to China, carrying forty locomotives and eighteen steel bridges. And at the opening of the Atbara Bridge, made in Philadelphia, it was kindly said by Lord Kitchener: "The construction of this bridge, I think, may be fairly considered a record achievement. So far as the failure of the efforts to place the construction order in England is concerned, I think it demonstrates that the relation between labor and capital there are not sufficiently well established to give confidence to the capitalist, and to induce him to take the risk of establishing up-to-date workshops that would enable Great Britain to maintain herself as the first constructing nation in the world. But, as England failed, I am delighted that our cousins across the Atlantic stepped in. The bridge is due to their energy, ability, and power to turn out works of magnitude in less time than anybody else. I congratulate the Americans on their success in the erection of a bridge in the heart of Africa. They have shown real grit far from home, in the hottest month of the year, and depending upon the labor of foreigners."

Home, Sweet Home!

A [illegible] ers; and we all know that out of [illegible] sirous of taking on themselves the service [illegible] a fine nature. They who bend the knee only to self, are weaving the shroud of the heart's best affections; and the man or the woman [illegible] unbearable. A wise teacher of the ancient world said: "Give me a single domestic grace and I will turn it into a hundred public vir[illegible]"

One of the greatest charms, then, of that happy period between falling in love and marriage, is the preparation of a home, for home is the anchor of married life. God has not made us to differ in this respect. A pleasant home is the dream and hope of every good man and woman; but no house is a home till it is swept and garnished for our special tastes and necessities; until it contains not only the wherewithal to refresh the body, but also something for the comfort of the heart, the elevation of the mind, and the delight of the [illegible]

If we would fairly estimate the moral power of furniture, let us consider how attached it is possible for us to become to it. There are chairs in our childhood's home that are sacred objects to us—the large, easy one, in which some saint sat patiently waiting for the angels; the little high chair, which was some darling baby's throne, till he "went away one morning"; the low rocker in which mother nursed the whole family of stalwart sons and lovely daughters. Ask any student or writer how much he loves his old desk, with its familiar conveniences. Have they not many a secret between them? Are they not famil[illegible] sorrow? Nothing is more certain than that we do stamp ourselves upon dead matter, and impart to it a kind of life. Is there a more pathetic engraving than that of Dickens' study after his death? Yet no human figure is present. There is nothing but furniture—the desk on which he wrote those wonderful stories, and the empty chair before it. Nothing but the empty chair and the confidential desk to [illegible] they do it!

It is certain, then, that lovers who leave a happy home, have a positive ideal to realize. There is no speculation in their efforts; they know that home is "sweet home." But in all their imaginings, chairs and tables, and carpets, and curtains, must have a conspicuous place. Now, as this life is all we have to front eternity with, nothing that touches it will be of small consequence; for if it is something to the body to have comfortable and pretty surroundings, it is much more to the mind. Is there any one whose feelings and energies are not depressed by a cold, comfortless room? And who does not feel a positive exaltation of spirit in the glow of a bright, prettily furnished apartment?

All rooms open to the public must have a certain air of conventional arrangement, but the private parlor in every home ought to be a room of character and individuality. It should be the very shrine and sanctuary of the Lares and Penates. Here will be placed the young wife's chair and work-basket, and the young husband's sofa, on which he will rest and read the evening paper. As children come, the girls will practise in it, and the boys rig their ships and study their lessons, and mamma look serious over the house-books. In this room the picture papers will lie around, every one's favorite volume be on the table, and the walls will be sacred to the family portraits. In this room the family councils will all be held, and dear invalids nursed back to health. Here the boys will come to say "good-by" when they go away to school or business. Here the girls, in their gay party dresses, come for papa's last bantering [illegible] look of admiration. Oh, this dear, unfashionable, untidy parlor! It is the citadel of the household; it is the heart of the home.

We [illegible] people are very proud and very fond of our Saxon word "home." We sing a great deal about its "sweetness." Some of us make our homes beautiful and homelike, though probably it is only by the sensations of discomfort we experience when we find ourselves in the barren [illegible] the atmosphere of our own home. There is a [illegible] human need. We compel our people to be educated. Can we not persuade them to have [illegible] cheerfulness and comfort and beauty? And [illegible] hold that to "give voice to the love of beauty that does exist in people's hearts, and lead them on to see the connection between good work and natural law and order, is not only to lead them to be artists in the best sense, but [illegible] this care for the adornment of our homes. Over three thousand years ago the "minor arts" received the divine sanction, and were [illegible] further, and say that they were then inspired, or "God-breathed," if never before. "I have [illegible] feel, the son of Uri. . . . And I have filled him with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship . . . . to devise cunning works, to work in gold, and silver, and in brass, and in cutting of stones, to set them; and in carving of timber, to work in all manner of workmanship . . . . of the embroiderer in blue, and in purple, in scarlet, and in fine linen; and of the weaver, even of them that do any work, and of those that devise cunning work."

Is it, then, an idle fancy to suppose that over our humble attempts to make our homes homelike and beautiful there rests a benediction? No!

No question which has appeared in the columns of any publication, religious or secular, in recent years, has awakened so much discussion.

In submitting the matter to our readers for their opinion we have followed our own precedent, and we are confident that the general result of the debate—now at its height and touching every State and all denominations—will be wholesome and beneficial. For variety of argument, beauty, vigorous characterization and firm adherence to high principle, as well as for exemplification of the broadest and most generous Christianity, the discussion affords the amplest latitude. It is a theme concerning which few can afford to remain silent and passive while the verbal conflict rages with such interest on every side.

Largest Vessel Afloat

NEW YORK welcomed on Sept. 13th the largest vessel in the world, on her maiden trip across the Atlantic. For many years past, the steamship companies have been directing their efforts to an increase of speed, and they have reduced the time of the voyage from Queenstown to five days, seven hours and twenty-three minutes, which is the record of the Lucania of the Cunard line, the shortest time in which the voyage has been done. A still better record than even this, was made by the German steamship Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which holds the record for speed of all kinds. But the White Star line determined to build a vessel of another kind, in which speed should not be the chief object sought. They designed the Oceanic, which was to be so large and so powerful that it would be unaffected by weather, and would be sure to reach port on schedule time. The result is the largest vessel ever built. The only vessel that approached her in dimensions was the Great Eastern, which proved a gigantic failure owing to errors in her construction. She was 691 feet in length; the Oceanic is 705 feet 6 inches. The builders of the new vessel followed the lines of the Majestic and the Teutonic of their own line, which have been proved most suitable for ocean travel. The width therefore of the Oceanic is less than that of the Great Eastern by fifteen feet, thus decreasing the resistance of the waves. She has seven decks, all plated, and her depth may be imagined from the fact that the Captain's bridge is eighty feet above the keel. The chief difference between her and the older vessel, however is found in the engine-room. The Great Eastern's engines had a register of 8,000 horse-power, while the Oceanic's engines register 28,000, which make a difference in speed of twenty knots against thirteen and a half. She crossed the ocean from Queenstown in six days, two hours and thirty-seven minutes. The owners, however, insist that it was comfort and regularity that they aimed at, rather than speed, in her construction. She is designed to carry an enormous number of passengers. She can accommodate 410 in the first cabin, 300 in the second cabin and 1,000 in the steerage, which, with a crew of 394, makes 2,104 persons on this floating palace. The passengers who came over in the new vessel speak in glowing terms of the comfort of the voyage. Her shape and vast size combined to render her so steady that the highest waves had no appreciable effect upon her; there was no sense of motion. Passengers who suffer from sea-sickness will be prompt to appreciate this advantage. In making the voyage of life, those who do it under Christ's conduct have an analogous advantage. They are kept serene and undisturbed in the storms they encounter by the way.

Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee (Isa. 26: 3).

THE WHITE STAR LINE'S STEAMER, "OCEANIC," THE LARGEST SHIP EVER BUILT

News From Star-land

An astonishing discovery is announced by Prof. W. W. Campbell, of the Lick Observatory. This is the fact that the well-known star Polaris, the North Star, is not a single body, but is composed of three suns, two revolving around one another and both revolving around the third. The discovery is one of a long series made by the aid of this wonderful telescope and is the most surprising of all. The telescope had already revealed the fact that Polaris was composed of two stars, each being distinctly visible. An examination of one of them by the aid of the spectroscope, attached to the telescope, showed that every fourth day it gave out a double ray of light. This could only result from the presence of another star, revolving around its companion in a period of four days. No telescope sufficiently powerful to reveal the fact of this doubling is in existence, but the spectroscope's evidence is accepted by astronomers as conclusive proof of the second star being composed of two. Mary Proctor writing on the new discovery to the New York Herald, says: "From this we infer that the Pole Star is a sun, with white, yellow or ruddy rays, while the smaller companion suns are probably green or blue. The Pole Star may glow with a white light, resembling that of our own sun, its rays mingling at times with those of the companion blue or green suns as they rise over the eastern horizon. Here we have a system of three suns, probably illuminating with their rays a retinue of circling worlds and their attendant satellites and ministering to the needs of countless living beings on these planets, for we can scarcely believe that our own planet is the only inhabited atom in space." It seems possible that Christ had this fact in mind when he spoke of the extent of his Father's house.

In my Father's house are many mansions (John 14: 2).

Peary in the Arctic

The Windward, the vessel in which Peary went on his Arctic voyage of exploration, has returned, leaving the explorer behind. The vessel was imprisoned for a year in the ice. During that time and after her release, Peary and his sledges made journeys amounting to over 1,500 miles, not counting return over the same track. These long trips were made both for exploration and also to establish caches of supplies along the west side of the channel leading to the north, so that they may be available next Spring and during the time the explorer is engaged in his explorations. These supplies and others that will be added to them will enable Mr. Peary to begin his researches on the north coast of Greenland. He purposes spending the winter in a comfortable house which he has built. He intends to collect more dogs to take the place of those that perished during one of his absences from camp, so that even if the Windward does not reach him in time he can proceed by sledges on his way northward. It appears that last season was unusually severe and that has delayed his movements. In one of his journeys his feet were partially frozen and it was necessary to amputate some of his toes. This injury compelled him to turn back before reaching the highest point of latitude attained by Lockwood and Nansen. He has evidently the true explorer's spirit, which is not to be daunted by obstacles or by personal danger, but presses on toward the goal. If men were only as much in earnest in trying to win eternal life and reach the heavenly city, they would never fail.

From the days of John until now, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force (Matt. 11: 12).

Married at Last

A Jersey City, N. J., journal reports a marriage which was originally planned more than two years ago. The date first fixed for it was in the spring of 1897. Cards were issued and all arrangements made. But just before the wedding day, the prospective bride's father died and the invitations had to be recalled and the wedding postponed. When the customary period of mourning had expired, a new date in June, 1898, was fixed. But before the day, the bridegroom was prostrated by severe illness and lingered between life and death for several months. Mainly through the care and attention of his future wife he recovered, and the wedding was fixed for the third time in the spring of this year. But before the day arrived the bride fell ill and for some weeks it seemed probable that those two would never be married. Slowly and painfully she regained her strength and there was some discussion about fixing another day for the ceremony. But the bridegroom would not hear of it. He called a carriage on the first day the physicians would allow the invalid to go out and drove with her to the house of their minister, who speedily pronounced the words that made them one. Instead of sending out invitations to the wedding, which had already been done three times, they notified their friends that it had taken place. They acted wisely at last. If those who contemplate union with Christ would act thus promptly, instead of postponing it to old age, or a period of sickness, or some "more convenient season," many souls would be saved who are now without hope.

Behold now is the accepted time, behold, now is the day of salvation (II Cor. 6: 2).

Electrical Immunes

An electrician in New Orleans mentions a fact which he has observed in his own occupation, and of which he is quite sure, though he is unable to explain it. It is that the bodies of men employed in and around electrical plants become to a large degree immune to shocks from live wires. He has seen men receive shocks which would kill any ordinary man, yet apparently suffer little from them. One incident, he mentions in illustration. It was a case in which two men came in contact accidentally with a live wire, and both received, at the same time, precisely the same current. One of them was a helper around a dynamo, and had met with accidents of the same kind, though not so serious an one, before. He was knocked down and stunned by the shock, but was up again and about his work in two minutes, and was apparently none the worse. The other, who was a larger and much stronger man, but a stranger to electrical work, was half an hour before he recovered consciousness, and was ill in bed afterwards for several days. Evidently repeated shocks have a tendency to increase the power of resistance, and it is well for the men who have much to do with electricity that it is so; but in the spiritual world, where the same tendency is observed, the result is deplorable. The man who is not brought to God by affliction is liable to become hardened against him and to die impenitent.

He that being often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed and that without remedy (Prov. 29: 1).

BRIEF NOTES

The educational classes of the West Side Y. M. C. A., in New York, will be arranged on October 2. Young men desiring to make this a profitable winter for study should attend the opening meeting at the rooms, 318 West Fifty-seventh Street, on that day, or send to the Secretary for a prospectus.

The Order of St. Christopher, which has been organized for institutional work, will receive on October 1 ten consecrated young men for the three and a half years' training and service required by the rules of the Brotherhood. For full particulars address the Director, 138 East Fifteenth street, New York.

The Central China Mission of the M. E. Church has a hospital at Nanking. Recently a member of the famous Li family became a patient there. The resident surgeon removed a tumor from his neck. So grateful was the patient for the relief that he made a donation of a thousand dollars to the hospital funds.

An effort is to be made to render permanent the tent work which has been so successful in New York during the summer. A suitable auditorium is being sought in which to hold the meetings during the winter. Mr. Pratt, who has been in charge of them, says that care will be taken to prevent the movement issuing in a church organization, and it will be simply and solely a feeder for the churches.

St. Paul and Minneapolis, Minn., are becoming a Congregational centre. They now have thirty-three Congregational churches, with an aggregate membership of 6,396, about one-third of the membership of the State. Besides these churches and their Sunday Schools, there are sixteen branch and mission churches working in new fields, among which several give good promise of soon becoming churches.

Mrs. J. Fowler Willing announces the new session of her Training School and Settlement. Its building has been thoroughly renovated, and the prospects are excellent. The Settlement work done by the students is, Mrs. Willing says, of the most hopeful character. The school year lasts from October to June. Applications for admission should be made to Mrs. Willing, 463 West Thirty-second street, New York.

The Baptist Training School for Christian Work at 762 South Tenth street, Philadelphia, has vacancies for students. Six young ladies who have been trained in it have received appointments in the Woman's Baptist Foreign Missionary Society; three in the China Inland Mission, five in the Baptist Home Mission Society, and many others in various branches of Christian work. Applications for admission should be made to Mrs. J. N. Cushing, at the school or by letter.

MEXICAN AT WORK IN A MAGUEY FIELD

PROBABLY on no other frontier line in the world is the difference in types so pronounced as when one passes the border which divides the United States from Mexico. On the north is a race distinctively European, and with all the customs and culture of a high civilization; on the other is a nation more Indian than white, and with a civilization that is at least a couple of centuries behind that with which we are ourselves familiar. There is a strange blending of races and complexions in Mexico, but no less strange than the contrast between the conditions of the rich and the poor, the learned and the ignorant, the hovels and the palaces.

In an article describing the life and conditions of Mexico to-day, Frederick S. Daniel throws some very interesting side-lights upon the people and their surroundings. He says:

"The first glimpse on crossing the Rio Grande begins the enormous difference between the soil and folks on either side of that frontier-line. As the train glides over the short separating bridge, the change is as one of magic. Presto! from wooden houses with enclosed gardens, trees and the high Caucasian types, in short, all that is familiar, the view sweeps to strange 'adobe' mud hovels, immense bare plains, mountain ranges, and few-and-far-between copper-colored beings, wrapped around with blankets, sitting before hovel doors or standing out in the plain, isolated as scarecrows, motionless and stoic-looking, as becomes good Indians. The general aspect is picturesque to an extent unequaled on the continent, but it is infinitely more pleasing in point of landscape attraction than of novelty as to people, dwellings and other artificial surroundings. From the starting border-line commences the ascent of the great 'table land,' extending over a thousand miles in length, shut in on either side by a continuous mountain range, rich with precious metals, and lifted over a mile on the average above the sea-level. From Texas, at its head, to Mexico City and Popocatapetl, at its foot, it comprises the choice portion of the republic in cultivation, settlement and urban growth. This famous plateau is climatically an ideal region for passing the heated months of the summer. The thermometer ranges the year round within a few degrees—highest in summer 70 degrees, lowest in winter 50 degrees. As there is a complete monotone in the people themselves, altogether a cast, build, appearance of special kind, so all their doings and belongings are in thorough unison: the attire and trappings, dismally subdued and dingy, unmistakably match the neutral skin and the serious, melancholy air of the dwellers, in full accord with their taste and affinities. The people have long been molded—stereotyped as it were—and so their dress, ways, life, are similarly set and fixed in unchangeable customs. Fashions there are, but they are all of one sort, traditional, inherited, and nothing in the way of change or currency in this respect is to be expected, because, being sought, it would not be found." tinuing, the writer touches on the peculiarity of the Mexican costume, especially that worn by the ladies. He says: "There are a few varieties in the styles and dress material worn, but they are exceedingly slight and on the whole do not stray far from the generally accepted pattern and never from the national custom of covering up the feminine head with shawls and the masculine body with blankets, mostly of a dull color, occasionally loudly striped or figured. It may be imagined what a singular look is given to a country where only blanketed men and be-shawled women are visible summer and winter—millions of ambulating blankets and shawls everywhere out of doors, youngsters being similarly arrayed, and with the most ludicrous effects in shading. In addition, a very general and conspicuous feature in the popular attire is its raggedness, or, rather, patchwork of rags, owing to economy, which extracts many years of use out of garments of all kinds, including some very peaked hats of straw and felt and sandals of canvas and leather."

A MEXICAN PEASANT HOUSEWIFE MAKING TORTILLAS

One prominent characteristic of Mexican nature, is the aversion to anything in the shape of energetic action in the affairs of every day life. While it is true that the Indo-Latin blood, when raised to the proper pitch, becomes a very torrent of fury, it is equally true that, in its normal condition, it is slow and leisurely in the extreme. This easy-going disposition is an inheritance of many generations standing, and is not to be eradicated in a few years by the introduction of modern ideas in Mexico, nor even by contact with the vigorous, wide-awake and aggressive civilization of the north. It will be a long time before the Mexican will be induced to discard his fixed habit of procrastination, and the calm stolidity with which he views the passage of time and the unhindered flight of golden opportunities. Nevertheless, the day of awakened energies and new natural life and vigor even for Mexico is a certainty of the future.

Our photographs on these two pages afford some glimpses of Mexican life and scenery, but no camera can reproduce the languid charms of the delicious climate, the picturesque simplicity of the people and the singular grace even of the humblest poor. On festal days, the Mexican peasant—except the very poorest of his class—undergoes a more or less complete transformation in dress, and every year, for many days at a time, the chief towns are absorbed in the festivities, which are usually connected with the popular spectacle of a bull-fight. On such occasions, although the native Mexican liquor circulates freely there is far less drunkenness than in most northern countries, for the average native is not addicted to intemperance. As travelers know to their sorrow, the Mexican menu is far from appetizing to a foreigner's palate. Except in a few of the very best class of homes and an occasional hotel with pretensions to modern comforts and cuisine, the table is a relic of antiquity and the kitchen is sadly in need of an infusion of modern ideas. In the gardens, however, the Mexican horticulturist proves his claim to rank as a skilled horticulturist. Many of these grounds are beautifully laid out with a variety of tropical plants and flowers in ornamental designs that make a brilliant and attractive display. The public gardens excel in their wealth of luxuriant foliage and richly colored parterres, and their walks are the promenade ground of the fashionables, whose principal occupation seems to be sauntering leisurely in the squares and gardens in the evenings or making social calls—the latter being an exceedingly formal function in all the Mexican cities. Church-going, too, is a fashionable rather than a religious exercise, and the dreary and monotonous service of the Catholic Church in nowise interferes with the chattering and small-talk that go on ceaselessly at such times. Such things as literary societies or intellectual or artistic gatherings are practically unknown outside the capital. Yet in her galleries and museums and private collections Mexico has many of the rarest gems of art, and some of her old buildings are architectural triumphs. There is a universal indifference, too, to the affairs of the outside world.

Still, with all their peculiarities, our Mexican cousins are good neighbors and entertain the friendliest feeling toward the United States. Their trade with this country is growing steadily, and their exports to our markets constitute two-thirds of their country's foreign trade. Railroads are slowly pushing their way, by gradual extension, into the heart of the country, and the fame and richness of their silver mines are a standard attraction for investors from abroad, without whose enterprise they would probably remain undeveloped for all time. Silver is the staple currency of the country, and it is a familiar sight to see bags full of newly minted silver dollars being carried around on the backs of men or mules in the public streets.

.... Peace or War in the Transvaal? ....

England's Reply Leaves Little Hope for a Pacific Settlement of the Present Troubles—A Correspondent's Interesting Letter

A DAY may precipitate a crisis in the Transvaal and witness the beginning of war between the Boers and the British. Secretary Chamberlain's reply to the Boer government's propositions has been received by the Volksraad at Pretoria, and is practically an ultimatum. President Kruger's government has sent an official response, which gives a firm negative to all the British demands, repudiates suzerainty, and repeats that the Boers are willing to submit the whole question to arbitration. Both in London and at the Cape, war is now considered as exceedingly probable, all the preparations pointing in that direction.

Late advices indicate that the Orange Free State, in the event of war, will be an ally of the Transvaal. A special session of the Orange State Parliament has been called to consider the situation, and prepare for emergencies. Meanwhile a thousand Boers are strengthening the defences at Pretoria.

GENERAL VIEW OF CAPE TOWN

MARKET DAY AT CAPE TOWN

A correspondent in South Africa, who has recently visited the disturbed section, sends the following letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"From the Convention of 1884 until the present time the Transvaal seems to have been actuated by two main purposes:

"First, to shut off the Cape or British Government from the north and to acquire a seaport for as they are now they are an entirely inland state, like Ohio, for instance, in the States—and almost entirely surrounded by British territory.

"Second, to retain all power in the hands of the Dutch burghers, denying all others, of whatever nationality, (Uitlanders), the franchise.

"In the first purpose the Boers have been signally thwarted, largely by the foresight and audacity of Cecil Rhodes. In the second they have been entirely successful. In the Convention of 1884 nothing was said about the franchise for Uitlanders. In the discussions preceding the drawing up of the Convention of 1881 it was stated by Mr. Kruger that nothing more than a 'slight difference' would be made in the treatment of the foreigner in respect to the franchise. As a matter of fact, a Uitlander could obtain burgher rights in five years according to the law in 1882. Then, there were only a few English settlers in the Transvaal. It was discovered that the Witswaterstrand—a ridge forty miles long—contained rich ledges of gold. Then came the rush of fortune-hunters. Millions of dollars' worth of expensive machinery was introduced and the gold output was enormous, jumping by kangaroo hops from 25,000 ounces in 1888 to 200,000 in 1895, to 475,000 ounces to-day.

"By 1890, the foreign population had risen to 48,000. In 1894 Sir Jacobus de Wet, the British agent in the Transvaal, estimated the population as follows: Transvaalers and Orange Free Staters (both Dutch), 70,861: British subjects, 62,509; other foreigners, 15,558. Then follows this significant sentence: 'The present number of registered voters, obtained from official sources, amounts to 18,126.' A large number of those 77,000 Uitlanders had been in the country since 1887, and yet in 1894 not one of them had been granted a voice in the government.

"In the present troubles, the Uitlanders make up a strong case against the Boer government. One of their principal grievances, aside from the withholding of the franchise, is the dynamite concession. Dynamite is absolutely necessary in blasting all along the forty-mile gold reef. When the mines are in full operation they use 250,000 cases per annum. The ordinary cost of dynamite at the edge of the Transvaal is $11.50 per case: but the government granted a concession to a company of Boers who charge $21.50 a case, pocketing $10 on each case: this is divided up among influential individuals—for instance, it is said, one member of the Raad gets five shillings, the government gets ten shillings or $2.50, while the other twenty-five shillings or $6 goes to the other members of the company. In this way $2 [illegible] is absorbed by a direct tax on industry. The railroad administration is another grievance: passenger and freight tariffs are exorbitant. It has been proved that ox-teams can haul freight as cheaply as the railroads under the present tariff.

"The interference with the Supreme Court by the government has also caused grave apprehension. Under a certain law, everything the Volksraad does is constitutional, because it has passed this law to forbid the Supreme Court to pass upon it, and the judges of the Supreme Court can be appointed and dismissed by the President.

"The Boers are really, so far as their independence is concerned, in a very serious position. If they give the ballot to the Uitlanders, who now outnumber them and who will simply pour into the Transvaal from all the surrounding English territory, the government will gradually be taken off their shoulders and out of their hands. They will be voted into retirement. If the Boers do not give the Uitlanders some form of immediate suffrage, England will step in, with diplomacy first, and if that fails, with an imperial army.

"The Jameson raid aroused the Boers to a realization of their danger. They have spent $10,000,000 since for forts and guns to defend themselves in case of a similar attack. These forts command the gateways of the country and frown down from heights above the principal cities. If the Boers were defeated in the field they would retreat to these granite citadels, turn the great Krupp guns, first against the invaders, and failing to stay them, they would wheel them around, depress their death-dealing muzzles and, to change the figure of another desperate Dutchman, Oom Paul, like a modern William of Orange, would break down the dykes of civilization, and give the Transvaal back to barbarism.

A Floral Peace Jubilee

On Historic Ground — Patriotic Children — Churches and Sunday Schools

CHILDREN and peace, children and patriotism, children and flowers — one always likes to connect these in thought; and in picture they ever make pretty conjunctions. So our readers will be interested in our illustration of one particularly attractive feature of the recent Floral Peace Jubilee at Saratoga Springs. The "Patriotic Children's Float," covered with laurel leaves and white hydrangeas, bore on each side in scarlet immortelles, the words "Children of the American Revolution." Twenty-two lads and lassies, all in white—save for the loyal red, white and blue ribbons on their shoulders—rode in it.

The "Patriotic Children" were, as is ever meet for patriotic children, in eminently good company. First, we must say, that preceding them in parade rode "a Roman soldier, bearing a dove, the emblem of peace." Near them, was the Saratoga Hospital landau, all green leaves and red roses, and bearing four pretty little maids in the regulation white uniforms and caps of nurses; also the Saratoga Home for Children float, gay with golden marigolds. Every one of our little readers would have clapped their hands when the moss-covered "Old Oaken Bucket" came into line, on a float twenty-one feet long, with realistic well and curb, and swinging at the end of a long, quaint sweep flower-garlanded; this particular bucket belonged to the children of the First M. E. Sunday School. "Mizpah," was the name of the Bethesda P. E. Sunday and mission schools' "Chariot of Fire," a coach all covered with crimson gladioli; then there was the white-and-blue flower exhibit of the First Presbyterian Church; the carriage of the Second Presbyterian Church covered with red berries of the mountain ash; the purple and white asters of the First Baptist, and the "true blue" of St. Faith's School. "Hiawatha's Sailing," the public school float, was a canoe decked out with marigolds, an Indian standing in it. Of course, there was a "Liberty Bell," all red, white and blue flowers.

The Floral Association's float was Dewey's flagship Olympia, all white flowers and goldenrod, with the Admiral's blue pennant floating from her masts, and on her deck three cute little "jackies," all in white. Business houses, railroad companies and grown folks' societies were on parade in the Floral Peace Jubilee; but, of course, there could be nothing quite so pretty and interesting as the floats in which the children were concerned. Perhaps some of our little readers are members of the Society of the Children of the American Revolution. If so, they know that one of the objects for which, in 1895, this society was created is that the descendants of the heroes and heroines of 1776 may, in every way possible to children, forward the cause of good citizenship and good government, and so contribute to conditions which prevent war. Studying American history, memorializing national hymns, affiliating with all organized bodies of children engaged in good works, helping little foreigners to love their new country, are other lines along which their leaders seek to guide them. The founder of the order and its national president is Mrs. Daniel Lothrop, well known as a friend of children in many ways. The conscientious guide of the Bemis Heights branch is Mrs. George Perkins Lawton. Our little readers who are students of American history know that famous battles of the Revolution were fought on Bemis Heights and near Saratoga Springs. They will be glad that the last engagement there was a "Battle of Flowers," and we are sure that as they grow up they will try to live that Christ life which will hasten the coming of a "Peace Jubilee" when "wars and rumors of wars" shall be no more.

THE PATRIOTIC CHILDREN'S FLOAT AT SARATOGA—MRS. LAWTON, PRESIDENT

A Bi-Centennial Baby

Think of a place where no baby has been born for over two hundred years! "Dear, what an unfortunate place!" our readers, big and little, must exclaim. The place is Balta, one of the far-away Shetland Islands. During the recent herring-fishing season a little baby—the only one for over two centuries—first opened its eyes upon God's beautiful world in the little island. From far and near visitors came to see him; the rosy little man was dowered with hundreds of silver coins from admiring beholders, and the laird of the island sent him a check for £25, English money, which is about $125 in ours. His name is Balta Geddes Polson. Our little readers may find Balta, a mere speck of an island, off the west coast of Unst. Few people live upon it except during the herring-fishing season.

Men as "House-Maids"

A very novel turn in domestic affairs has taken place in Chicago. In hundreds of households men are taking the places of women as help. This came about through the united action of women servants a few months ago, in putting the price of their labor above the reach of ordinary purses. Wives of men not making large incomes had to do all their own cooking, house-cleaning, washing, ironing, door-bell answering, minding the babies, put up school-children's lunches, etc., etc. Of course, one woman can not do all these things; and the outcome of it was that advertisements like this began to fill the columns of Chicago papers: "Wanted—A capable young man as second girl. Must have good references." So, now it is quite the fashion in Chicago to have men and boys as cooks and "maid-of all-work." They are said to be very satisfactory, able to do the work women have done, and to add to it heavier work which women could not do.

Little Florence and the Collie

The story is told that Florence Nightingale's first patient was a wounded shepherd dog. Mr. and Mrs. Nightingale, who were very charitable, provided their little girl with delicacies for the sick, which she carried in a little basket at her saddle-bow when accompanying her pastor on his visits to the sick and poor. It was on one of these expeditions that the minister and the child saw an old shepherd, named Roger, trying to collect his sheep without the assistance of his good collie, Cap. "Where is your dog, Roger?" asked the dominie. "Some boys threw stones at him and broke his leg," almost sobbed the shepherd, "an' I'm thinkin' I'd better make an end o' his meesery." Florence ran into the shepherd's hut, knelt beside Cap, patted him with her little hand, and murmured words of pity and kindness. The pastor followed the child, and on examining Cap's injuries found them not so serious as the shepherd feared. Among the things ordered for the collie's relief were hot compresses. These the little girl insisted on applying herself to the afflicted member, and staid beside Cap for several hours wringing cloths out of boiling water and laying them on Cap's leg.

"Don't Lean on Me"

A lady relates this incident from recent experience on a street-car:

Before me stood a tall, beautiful girl, her mother beside her. They looked alike. When the car gave a sudden start the mother stretched her hand toward her daughter, and I was startled to hear the latter say, "Don't lean on me!" The mother stepped back and felt for the strap. Maybe the mother had said to that girl when she was a child, "Don't lean on me!" And, if so, the mother was reaping what she had sowed. "Don't bother me!" "Go away!" is seed, and the harvest from it will be bitter. Do not forget that the tables may be turned.

We would add a word to the young: Don't shake off the old folks, even if in busy, trying times father and mother did not give you all the attention that you wished. The youth of to-day have thousands of advantages their parents and grandparents did not have. "Unto whomsoever much is given, much is required." Fortunately, few young women are so ill-bred and undutiful as to behave like this girl in the street-car.

The Bells of Heaven

ADOWN the heights of glory, hoar and clear,
The wondrous bells of heaven, joyful, ring;
Grand peal on peal, sweep outward far and near Anthems of praise to the eternal King.

High arching o'er, a radiant bow of light,
Each golden bell a pure and perfect tone,
Each answering to each, in full delight
Of harmony complete, to earth unknown.

Bathed in a living, pulsing sea of sound,
The 'raptured ringers lift the jub'lant voice,
And over all, sweet melody, unbound,
Swells the triumphant theme, "Rejoice! rejoice!"

Sometimes the pilgrim on this lower plain,
Hushing the soul, by earthly turmoil riven;
May catch a faint, sweet, tender, joyous strain,
The far off echoing of the bells of heaven.

A Sister's Influence

GIRLS, do you know that a sister has a great deal to do in the molding of a brother's character? Do you know that you have much to do with the sort of husband he is going to make, and so, with shaping the happiness or misery of his home? It isn't enough to teach him to just love and respect you—although this you must do—and do it by being admirable and worthy. You have failed in your mission if you do not teach him to reverence all women, as did Christ, who said even to her whom other men would stone: "Go, and sin no more." Teach your brother that he is his sister's keeper, and that his sister is every woman God has made; and that even in the ruined and wandering one, there is a precious soul which his straight walk with God may save. "Oh, Benjie, you hurt me!" the writer once heard a noble sister say to the younger brother who was speaking—not ill—but lightly of a girl friend. "You, sis! why, what have you to do with it? You're all right!" "But you, Benjie? You, my knight, without fear and without reproach! I cannot bear to think that a thoughtless girl's unhappy blunders make mirth for you. When you are not true and knightly to all women, you are not true to mother and me. Every time you help a sister woman to be truer and better, you're paying tribute to mother and me. Every time you fail in this, you cast reproach on us, whose part it has been to teach you how to regard women and how to treat them. Every wayward girl is a wound to womanhood; and every man who helps a girl to be wayward, wounds his father and his sister and his mother."

Odd Marriage Customs

In China, in "good society," the ceremonial is elaborate, although the father has offered his daughter to the father of the groom as "an ugly and ill-favored child;" and the groom's father who has accepted her for his son, describes him as "slothful, indigent, and weak in intellect. The bride's procession, for which even a mandarin must make way, goes to the bridegroom's house, is carried over his threshold, and there the husband beholds for the first time the woman he has married. In Japan the lighting of the bridal torches is a beautiful part of the ceremony. The Persian wedding includes a torchlight procession. An Arab wedding lasts seven days, and after the ceremony the husband sees his wife for the first time. A Moorish wedding is also a seven days' feast. In Turkey, the bride stands behind a screen during part of the ceremony and is first seen by the bridegroom at its conclusion.

SHALL a church accept gifts for missionary and other spiritual work from a saloon keeper, is still the uppermost question in the minds of multitudes of God's people, many of them being as yet undecided. More light is shed upon the subject by the letters which appear below:

"A Tithe Man," Westboro, Mass., writes:

The rum-seller gave the money to the church, not to God. If the church give it to God in faith and love, he is well pleased. If the church praised the rum-seller to get the money, and made him feel that his business was right and honorable, they had better hesitate in offering it to God; but if the money was gained by the church in an upright and honorable way, use it. I say, despoil the devil of as much money as possible in right ways.

S. Berkeybile, Altoona, Pa., writes:

I am very much decided against receiving money from saloons or any other such evil traffic to carry on church work. Must the people of God resort to taking money from such evil places as saloons to carry on its work? Can the people of God afford to compromise with the devil by taking money from such a den as the saloon, which has robbed many a poor family of their daily bread and clothing? If the saloon-keeper would do a good act, let him get out of the rum traffic and help save men's souls, instead of ruining them.

M. A. Dunlap, Academy, W. Va., writes:

How much worse is a saloon keeper than a lawyer who is willing to undertake any case, regardless of its justice, if only there be money in it for him? How much worse than the physician who learns just enough of his profession to be permitted to practise, and then spends the rest of his days practising upon the community at large for the money there is in it, when he often does not know enough of anatomy to make a good butcher? How much worse is the saloon-keeper than the merchant who sells shoddy for good, solid goods and split leather for whole stock? How much worse than the minister who preaches for the loaves and fishes, and stays and stays in one place because his living is there, long after his day of usefulness is over, or removes from place to place to secure a better salary, regardless of his ability to serve his Master?

H. Hudson, Saltillo, Pa., writes:

What I want to know is, what the Lord thinks about it. Did he allow the price of a dog in his house (Deut. 23: 18)? The fault was not in the money but the manner in which it was got. What would our Saviour say if he were here as he was once? Not to take the money for the Lord surely is the safe side of the question, when we know how it was got. The money for the dog would be less obnoxious to our Heavenly Father than money that ruins souls.

Florence B. Hyde, Philadelphia, writes:

I think there is one thing which will settle all questions: "Whatever one is in doubt about, don't do." The very fact that we question such a gift, implies a doubt. Let us do nothing but what we know God approves.

Constant Reader, New York, writes:

If we were guided by impulse and inclination we would answer I. R. N.'s question by a simple negative; the saloon traffic is so vile and so injurious to the community that the Christian is naturally repugnant to touching anything associated with it. But there ought to be a logical reason for rejecting a gift that may be made in good faith and as an expression of a desire to make restitution in a measure for wrongs done by the traffic. It is not easy to find a logical reason that will stand the test of examination. One man says "Refuse it, because it is the price of blood." But it is not; it is the price of liquor. Howsoever we may denounce him, the saloon-keeper is a trader. He does not force his commodity on an unwilling public. He is there with his stock of liquors, and when a man enters and asks for it he is supplied. If the people do not want it they need not buy it. All this talk about the saloon-keeper being a murderer and a stealer of women's rings and children's shoes is nonsense. It is the husband and father who does that, and he must not try to transfer his responsibility to the saloon-keeper.

"But the money is tainted." Is it? Suppose the saloon-keeper, whose fifty-dollar bill the church rejects, pays the bill to some good man for a horse, and the good man gives the identical bill to the church: the church would accept it then, and rightly, for there is no taint on the money. Or, suppose the saloon-keeper, dying, leaves his money to his daughter, a pious girl, who gives a sum to the church. It would be rightly accepted, though it was part of the proceeds of the traffic. Or, to come still closer, suppose the saloon-keeper is converted, quits the business and becomes a pious man. What [illegible] liquor traffic. No, the church cannot logically reject the gift on the ground that the money is tainted.

[illegible] church ascertain the motive in any case? Must the usher say as he holds out the plate and a man puts in a gift, "You must furnish a certificate of character before I can accept your money. How did you get your money? What is your motive in giving it? The Lord's money must be clean." Perhaps a man is disposed to put a dime on the plate, but the collector is a man whose respect he desires, so he puts in a dollar, that he may stand well with the collector. Must the church reject the ninety cents on the ground that the motive of the giver was impure?

It seems to me that the only ground for rejecting the gift is that of complicity. That might be avoided by saying to the saloon-keeper: "We are unalterably and uncompromisingly opposed to your business. If you think to buy off our opposition with your money, you are mistaken and you had better not give it. We shall use it to make men Christians, and that will injure your business by depriving you of customers. If, understanding that fact, you still desire to give the money, we will take it." I believe the church will not suffer in any way by accepting a gift from a saloon-keeper if she has made her position clear and kept her skirts free from the taint of complicity.

Miss M. A. Quirk, Cleveland, O., writes:

Is not all saloon-keeper's money the price of blood? A curse rests on it. I do not think we ought to use it even in the church. A blessing cannot be asked upon it.

F. J. Wise, San Antonio, Tex., writes:

The idea that such money is "tainted," has "spot and blemish," that it comes covered with sorrow and suffering, is illiberal and senseless. Nay, it is unchristian, because the injunction to give alms, to bestow charity, and to contribute means to all good work, is obligatory upon all people without regard to the callings and conditions of life. It has long been held by the courts that money has no earmarks. It is the creature of society. Its value is stamped by human governments to answer the necessities of life, and although it may pass through the till of the saloon-keeper, or the hands of the robber, it does not lose its conventional functions. It cannot think and feel, reason or compare, yet it can be the means of doing good or evil. The hand that directs it is the good or guilty agent. Upon the receiver of benefactions rests all the responsibility, and not upon the donor, actuated by holy motives. No man is absolved from doing good. The church cannot discriminate and say, "Your money must be acquired in a certain way, and if it comes from such and such sources, it must be rejected." The saloon keeper's dollar will buy a Bible for the heathen, and bread for the starving, as well as your or my dollar. If money designed for Christian work is to be derived from particular sources, in conformity with popular notions and prejudices, you will exclude the great majority of mankind from exercising charity, having faith, or cherishing hope.

N. L. Cogswell, Cortland, N. Y., writes:

Money received from a saloon-keeper or [illegible] is nothing short of money paid to saloon-keepers for damnation to mankind, and is the price of their blood and price of their souls. How dare you [illegible]?

Mrs. H. Salisbury, Los Angeles, Cal., writes:

Accept it, and in whatever way it is used, the prayer of the church should go with it; also a prayer for the saloon-keeper. In so doing, a double blessing might come from it, where if it was refused no good results could follow.

L. Heaphy, Watertown, N. Y., writes:

It would be decidedly wrong to receive money that has been obtained in a way good Christians condemn. We cannot to-day, any more than we could the time the words were spoken by the Master, "gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles." Can we utilize the gains of evil-doing to put down evil? Saloon-keepers' money to save the world for Christ?

Mrs. C. Gaulin, Wilmington, Del., writes:

It seems to me that the money should be accepted and prayers offered for the giver, and the means used exclusively for temperance work.

Laura M. Walker, Arlington, O. T., writes:

I think it is an honor to help a religious cause. I do not think we owe any honor to Satan or his followers. While we lived in Oklahoma City, a saloon-keeper died. His wife wanted to call in a minister, but the dying man would not let her. He said it would be an insult to God. He said he had eased his conscience with the excuses that donations to churches would at the last day save him, but, he said, "Hell's gates stand wide open to receive me." No deeds of charity he had made would save him.

A. W. Hartman, Bradner, O., writes:

Accept it and press for more, but give it back to the poor it was taken from. The saloon-keeper makes his money largely off the poor and destitute, therefore I believe in distributing it among those from whom it was taken.

M. Gore, Wilmore, Kan., writes:

If it is justifiable to accept the gift of a saloon-keeper, why not connect a saloon with the lecture room of the church and apply the whole profit of the business to the missionary fund, and thus in doing evil, good may come. I would say, "thy money perish with thee."

Jno. R. Mitchell, Baltimore, writes:

It would be entirely proper for a church to accept a gift of money from a saloon-keeper, because it might help undo some of his, and other (devil's) work), and would go as far and accomplish as much, as though given by the most consistent church member.

Rev. W. A. Mount, College Point, N. Y., writes:

Gen. 14: 21-23: "And the King of Sodom (in the question of the saloon-keeper) said unto Abram (who represents the church), 'Give me the souls and take the goods to thyself.' And the church said to the saloon-keeper, 'I have lifted up mine hand unto the Lord, the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth, that I will not take from a thread even to a shoe-latchet, and that I will not take anything that is thine, lest thou shouldst say I have made the church rich.'" This attitude gives more liberty to warn others against the saloon-keeper's snare, which would not be the case if one of these traffickers in souls and bodies of men on whom we depended for an offering, sat in the audience.

The saloon-keeper's gift might be offered to the church in as good faith as the King of [illegible] offered to Abram. [illegible] as Abram [illegible] God and gave [illegible] which is [illegible]

Mrs. E. Myer, Kingston, N. Y., writes:

[illegible] Does not the church accept money as gifts from [illegible] to go to a [illegible]

W. H., Toronto, Canada, writes:

When Naaman the Syrian asked the prophet Elisha what he should do when he went into the house of Rimmon to bow down there, the prophet simply said "Go in peace." That is [illegible] any directions on the subject, but left it to his own conscience and God. Now, it would [illegible] and harlots go into the kingdom of God before you." It is possible for a saloon-keeper [illegible] give drink to excess, as to be, in measure, a temperance worker, and even to be a God-fearing man, yoked, like righteous Lot, with [illegible] be a sport, or notoriously worldly or a wicked [illegible] Epistle of John we read approvingly of those who went forth in the Lord's work, "taking nothing of the Gentiles." It is said to have been a custom of the late George Muller sometimes to refuse contributions and return money when he had evidence that the contributors needed it to pay their just debts or for their own necessities. But then he did it lovingly, and with all possible courtesy.

Roberts Stevenson, Philadelphia, writes:

If I had the power to do so, I would close every saloon on the earth. But let us be consistent. Would the merchant, the banker, the lawyer or the physician turn down a saloon-keeper who desired to do business with him who paid his money for the value received? I think not. Why, then, should the saloon-keeper's money be any more objectionable to the church? If the great Searcher of hearts should make known his will, and incline such an one to give of what he has made, might it not be the first step toward a change of heart, and an ultimate change of business? Nothing is ever said against the church accepting gifts of money from men who have by their greed and illegitimate methods in business crushed the life out of many small interests—the men who form the trusts, who water the stock of railroads and corporations, and pile up wealth by fleecing innocent victims. Is their money any holier? I say, take the saloon keeper's money, and send him a life member's certificate, framed, requesting it to be hung up, if not in the bar room, in his bed room.

J. M. H., Rutherford, N. J., writes:

We cannot tell what influence has been at work, only our Father above can know that. I know an instance of a man having made a [illegible] His daughter was a great favorite with her young companions. She had attended the Sabbath School of a prominent Episcopal church. One beautiful Easter morning she was a member of a very large confirmation class. Though early in the season, all the church windows were open. While the bishop rested his hand on her head, pronouncing a blessing, a large pure white dove came in one of the front windows, flew the whole length of the church, and alighted on one of the arches just over the head of the girl. The circumstance seemed to affect the young girl's father much, and after a while he thought of giving up selling liquor and working at his trade. But as that change would not support the family in the style they had been used to, his wife over-persuaded him, telling him that if he did not sell liquor somebody else would, and they might just as well have the profits of it as any one. So the poor man banished his good resolve, and sold the vile poison till the day of his death. The party who made this offer of money may not have had watchful, praying, Christian parents, as those of us who have written some answers in regard to accepting the gift of the saloon-keeper. May it not have been the "Dove of Peace" that influenced him to make the offer, that being his first step towards a new life? Let all readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD pray for his conversion.

J. C. Hall, Waldo, Fla., writes:

Under no circumstance whatever should the church knowingly accept polluted money, whether it be offered by a saloon-keeper, gambler or brothel-keeper. As soon as the church accepts polluted money she places herself on a level with the source from whence the money came. Who would smite the hand that feeds him? Who would be antagonistic to one who literally supplied his wants? Who has not refused favors from persons to whom they wished to be under no obligation?

A great mass of other correspondence on this subject has been received, and a number of interesting letters will appear next week.

He says: "The Church Cannot Accept"

E. E. Waite, Jamestown, N. Y., writes:

If there ever was a curse on earth, and one that deserves to be exterminated by an outraged people, it is the liquor traffic. A business that makes drunkards, butchers thousands of innocent women and children every year, is the cause of nine-tenths of all the crime, and fills jails, prisons and poor-houses with criminals and inmates, ought to be outlawed from the face of the earth.

I do not believe the church has a right to accept money from saloons, and I would not have any respect for a church that did.

He asks: "Dare the Church Refuse?"

L. A. Copley, Wexford, Mich., writes:

If a saloon-keeper offers money to alleviate the flood suffering, what sane Christian would refuse to take it? To refuse would be to shut the door the Lord has opened to save the lives of his suffering people, and their blood would be upon us. Now, if a saloon-keeper offers money for the support of missionaries in Africa or any dark land, and we refuse to take it, and souls go out of this world into darkness for want of the light that that money might have brought them, who is to blame? The Lord opened the way; we shut the door.

TWELVE VIEWS : : : : : : OF THE CROSS

By DWIGHT L. MOODY

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is privileged to publish a series of unusually able and helpful contributions from the pen of Mr. Dwight L. Moody, the well-known evangelist, the first of which appears in this issue. These are from his latest work, Notes From My Bible,* concerning which he writes, in a brief introduction to the reader:

During the course of my reading, I have always tried to gather "nuggets" by the way, and make a note of them on the margin and blank leaves of my Bible. I have found it to be a useful habit, preserving for use many seed-thoughts and apt sayings that otherwise would have escaped my memory.

Notes From My Bible is the harvest of many years' gathering in this direction. The flowers in this book have been culled from many gardens. The arrangement is simple. Over against the text is the thought or illustration. At the beginning of the books and chapters of the Bible is placed whatever has a general reference to that section. A number of miscellaneous outlines are added at the end of Revelation.

Whether you are minister or layman, you will find that you will grow more deeply interested in your Bible day by day if you follow the course of making notes of sayings similar to those contained in this volume, of outline sermons, and of anything that helps to light up some well-known truth and fasten it in the memory. It is a good thing to be ready with new thoughts to present the old truths of the Bible.

The Yoke of Christ

Matt. 11: 29. The eastern yoke is made for two necks. If Christ is with us, we are blessed. There is no room for a third neck. II. Cor. 6: 14.

The only description of Christ's heart —"lowly."

The burden of law remains eternally the same, but the inspiration of grace enables men to bear it.

Something to do—"Come unto me."
Something to take—His yoke.
Something to leave—Your burden.
Something to find—Rest.

"Learn of me." If the life of Christ be not your pattern, the death of Christ will never be your pardon. What he was by nature, we should be by grace.

V. 30. He that deems the yoke of Christ heavy, will not find his crown easy.

When Christ takes the burden of guilt off a sinner's shoulders, he places the yoke of obedience upon his neck.

Ch. 12: 31. Those who think they have committed the unpardonable sin seldom worry themselves about other sins.

V. 45. If Godly sorrow takes possession of the house, it will quickly shut sin out.

Ch. 13: 23. Understanding the Word with the heart (v. 15) is the result of the Spirit's dealing, and indicates regeneration. I. Cor. 2: 10, 16.

The Pearl of Price

Ch. 13: 45. The "pearl of great price" is the church. Jesus Christ is the merchantman and gave all to purchase the pearl. Could not pay a higher price. Not "pearls," but the "pearl." Brought from great depths, into changed surroundings, at risk of diver's life; noted for purity: no need of polishing; perfect when found.

The church is the pearl. Believers are "jewels."

Ch. 14: 4. John the Baptist was an uncompromising preacher.

V. 9. The head of John the Baptist was a high price for a few moments' entertainment.

V. 31. "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" Peter had enough faith to keep him from drowning but not from doubting.

Ch. 15. The woman's faith overcame his Silence (v. 23); Sovereignty (v. 24); Severity (v. 26).

Ch. 16: 13–17. The answers of opinion and of revelation. Why did Jesus come into the world? I. John 3: 5, 8; John 1: 29; I. Tim. 1: 15; Luke 19: 10; etc.

What Think Ye of Christ?

Ch. 16: 13. It makes a great difference to men what they think of Jesus.

V. 15. It makes less difference to a man what others think of Jesus than what he thinks.

V. 16. A great confession. }
V. 22. A great collapse. }

V. 22: 23. The devil hates to consider the death of Jesus, knowing that it is so important.

V. 26. The devil gained the whole world and lost his soul. Who would change places with him?

Pleasure, Profit, and Preferment are the wicked man's trinity: and his carnal self is these in unity.

Ch. 17: 2. The law was given with thunderings, lightnings, and darkness. Christ was manifested in glory and peace.

V. 5. "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him." God here quotes three Old Testament texts:—

a. This is my beloved Son. Ps. 2: 7.
b. In whom I am well pleased. Isa. 42: 1.
c. Hear ye him. Deut. 18: 15.

This was the last time God spoke to men.

He who refuses to hear the voice of Jesus Christ shall never see his face.

Ch. 18: 3. "As little children." Not foolish, not playful; but gentle, obedient, truthful, pure, trusting.

V. 5. The pastor who leads the lambs will be able to lead the sheep. Every time you lay your hand on a child's head, you lay it on his mother's heart.

The Duties of Wealth

Ch. 18: 7. He that sins is weak; but he that leads others into sin is devilish.

Ch. 19: 21. "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me." It was the force of these words that moved Francis of Assisi to give up the world and become the power he was in the Church.

V. 22. Wealth is no harm, but the inability to give it up is deadly.

V. 23. Christian men often become rich, but rich men seldom become Christians.

V. 28. Now the world judges the godly. Hereafter the godly shall judge the world.

Ch. 20: 27. A humble saint looks most like a citizen of heaven.

Ch. 21: 37. Men would never have known that they would put God to death, unless Christ had been born.

Holiness and Watchfulness

Ch. 24: 42. The Lord's exhortations to holiness are never based on the fear of death, but on the hope of his return, and its unexpectedness.

We know the duty ("watch"), but not the day.

V. 47. The promotion God gives is not like earthly promotions, wherein the eminence of one excludes that of another —but rather like the diffusion of love in which the more each has, the more there is for all.

V. 49. Unkindness to the Lord's people, and fellowship with the ungodly, are two great marks of hypocrites.

Ch. 25: 15. Many thousands of watchsprings can be made out of a pound of iron. See that you improve faithfully the talent God has given you.

V. 21. Not "well done good and successful" servant, but "faithful" servant.

God has three kinds of servants in the world: (1) slaves, who serve him from a principle of fear; (2) hirelings, who serve him for the sake of wages; (3) sons, who serve him under the influence of love.

V. 34. The Church was chosen before the foundation of the world. Eph. 1: 4; Titus 1: 2. The Jews (here) "from the foundation of the world."

V. 35. Many love at their tongue's end, but the godly love at their finger's end.

Ch. 26. 20. The Lord's Supper is a memorial of a departed Friend, a prophecy of a returning Friend, and a parable of a present Friend.

V. 56. Christ's circle gradually narrowed down. First, the multitudes left him; then, many so-called disciples; lastly, the twelve.

Ch. 27. Christ's innocence was attested by: Judas, v. 4; Pilate's wife, v. 19; Pilate, v. 24; Herod, Luke 23: 15; Thief, Luke 23: 41; Centurion, Luke 23: 47.

V. 33. On Golgotha there were skulls of all sizes.

V. 35. The soldiers took from Jesus his garments, but he laid aside the robe of flesh of his own will.

Twelve Views of the Cross

Ch. 27: 36. The soldiers saw in Christ a criminal, with cruelty. The women saw in Christ a benefactor, with sorrow. His mother saw in Christ a son, with anguish. The disciples saw in Christ blighted hopes, with perplexity. The first thief saw in Christ a malefactor, with hardness. The second thief saw in Christ a King, with penitence. The centurion saw in Christ divinity, with conviction. The priests saw in Christ an impostor, with mockery. Angels saw in Christ love, with wonder. Devils saw in Christ the seed of woman, with dismay. Jehovah saw in Christ obedience, with affection. The passers-by saw in Christ nothing, with indifference.

The Cross cannot be explained. To nail our poor theories on that tree but shows how our love has cooled and stiffened and expired.

V. 57. None of the Gospels forget to mention Joseph of Arimathæa.

V. 63. Christ's enemies remembered what his disciples forgot: "We remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, 'After three days, I will rise again.'"

Ch. 28: 19, 20. "Go ye . . . I am with you." In other words, "Come with me to this work."

God had only one Son, and he sent him on a foreign mission.

A PRODIGAL SON

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

CHAPTER I

THE fire on the hearth leaped and glowed, for the evening was chilly, and its pleasant warmth was very welcome. On the table, spread for supper, were biscuits smoking from the oven, a cold roast chicken, a plate of ham thinly sliced, honey, cake, preserves and pickles, and the fragrant aroma of coffee filled the house. The little maid stood behind her mistress' chair, ready to wait on the family after grace had been said, and there was a general air of comfort and festivity about the room and the board. Only, beside Mrs. McDermott's place, at her right hand, there was a vacant chair.

For five years the table had been set every day, with a chair placed for Dave, his plate, his napkin, his knife and fork, just as if he might at any moment come in, and with a merry laugh and a kiss for his little mother, be again the life of the household. For five years his room upstairs had been scrupulously kept in waiting for him, every appointment of the bed and the bureau as he liked them to be, and on any night he would have found a light burning to receive him. In that five years, his mother's face had grown more deeply lined, and her dark hair had become frosted with silver, and her voice had gathered that intensity of vibration, which comes of keeping back one's tears. "Where is my wandering boy to-night?" was the question in the dark background of every hour and day, and never, for an instant, was the tension of anxiety relaxed.

At first, when Dave disappeared, there was the weary following up of clues in every direction; the mother had gone to hospitals, to prisons, to Blackwell's Island, to the Morgue. She had gazed into the sodden features of drowned men; she had looked into ghastly countenances of men stabbed in cruel saloon fights. There was no reason for flight, that any one knew of, at first. After a little, the mother learned that her boy had not left an altogether clean record. She sold part of her patrimony, and paid up Dave's indebtedness to the uttermost farthing. To others, he was Dave Sears, a good, but rather weak fellow, easily led, disposed to bad company, cross and dangerous when drunk, and Dave had been drunk more than once in the last year of his stay at home. But he was never cross with his mother, and, strange as it may seem, she, poor thing, did not know intoxication for the gruesome and vile possession it is, even when she saw it. She was mercifully blinded for a long time. When David went away, he was more to her, in her idolatrous love, than John, who had never given her an uneasy moment; than Robert, who was the mainstay of her house, or than Elizabeth, her only and tenderly loving daughter. Her youngest child, born after his father's death, there had been no limit whatever either to her love for him, or her foolish indulgence of his every whim.

"I wish mother would not put that chair at the table," said Robert one day. "The sight of it keeps her morbid."

"Oh, Bob," answered Elizabeth, "don't say one word. It would break her heart to put it away. Every morning of her life she rises with the feeling that David may come home to-day. She has not given him up. She is sure she will yet see him. Her present thought is that he has gone to the Klondike. Don't disturb her by so much as a hint, Bob."

"Of course I won't. What do you take me for? But, all the same, it is very unwise. I believe Dave is alive, and ashamed to come back, and maybe we'd be ashamed to have him."

"Don't say that, brother. Mother and I are praying for him. I would never be ashamed of my own flesh and blood—never—nor would you. Poor Dave would be a splendid fellow if he could let drink alone. It was social pleasure that tempted him at first. You know how much he was sought after for his brightness and cleverness and his gay wit. Poor Dave!"

[illegible] was a sore point with him that this prodigal should monopolize so much yearning affection from his mother and sister. He knew how to sympathize with the elder brother in the parable. "Lo, these many years do I serve thee, and yet thou never gavest me a kid that I might make merry with my friends." Others might understand this character and might call this man a churl; not so Robert; in his heart he approved of his position, and thought the prodigal, returning from the far country, had received better treatment than he deserved.

But it was only to Elizabeth that he grumbled, never to his mother, for he worshiped the ground she walked on, and would cheerfully have been trampled on by her little foot to have had the sort of love she lavished on the reprobate absentee brother. In truth, she did appreciate Robert, though he often antagonized her by his brusque manner and curt speech, and she did full justice to his good qualities; but here he was, well fed, well dressed, well groomed and comfortable, with a fine position and a liberal salary. Robert was an object of envy, not of compassion. John, the quiet, scholarly brother, was also well to do, and Elizabeth, who sat in a pretty studio and made artistic photographs and modelled in clay, needed no mother-pity. But [illegible]

Sometimes Mrs. Sears could not stand it in the house for thinking of him. It made her fairly wild. Then she would slip on her hat and coat and walk, walk the streets, up and down, to and fro, till the exercise tired her and the air brought her calmness. And pray? Only God knows how mothers pray, beating the throne itself with their clenched fists, crying out in their agony, forgetting to say, "Thy will be done," till some gentle, watching angel, sent to strengthen them, whispers it in their weary ear, and Christ himself comes to soothe and sustain them. If Hannah, praying God to send her a child, prayed in bitterness of soul, the mothers of the ages, praying for God-sent children gone astray, have far exceeded her. And God answers their petitions, though there are times when the answer is delayed, and though often it comes in a different form from the one they crave and expect.

Mrs. Sears pictured Dave in every depth of destitution of which she could, from her limited knowledge, make an image. But in her most exaggerated dreams she did not realize him as he had become.

As they sat at supper, with the firelight dancing and the lamp lit, and John gravely talking, and Elizabeth flashing a smiling look at him across the table, what would the mother have thought had she known that just outside the window, clinging to the railings, staring in through a crack in the shutters with hungry eyes, was a gaunt, wolf-like man, his threadbare coat buttoned over a collarless neck, his old shoes covering stockingless feet, his matted hair and unkempt beard clinging to a head and face as repulsive as those of the lowest tramp on the roadside. Once, twice, thrice his irresolute hand moved to ring the doorbell, for he saw the empty chair and knew what it meant, but something seemed to pull him back. Robert's clean respectability, Elizabeth's pretty evening frock, his mother's dainty laces, all repelled him.

"They are in heaven," he murmured.

A PRODIGAL SON

"and I—oh, my God!—am in hell!" He left the stoop, stumbled down the basement area steps and knocked at the lower door. When the cook came, a big Irish woman with a soft heart for a famished man, he humbly asked her for something to eat, and she brought him a plate full of food and a cup of steaming coffee, and he sat on the lowest step and ate and drank, and when he had finished to the last drop and the last crumb he got up and crept away, leaving platter and cup beside the door, on the mat, and saying "Thank you" in grateful tones as Irish Mary took them from their place. By this time he was again on the side walk, and the cook, struck by a lingering refinement in his voice, sent a blessing after him:

"The saints protect yez, poor bye; yez have seen better days."

Once more he mounted the stoop and looked in on Paradise, but now a rough hand was laid on his arm and a policeman gruffly bade him get a move on him, "you've been around here long enough."

The old policeman had grown stouter and grayer since Dave's absence, but Dave knew him. He turned and looked McIntyre in the eye.

"Don't worry, old man! Don't you know David Sears?"

The rain had begun to fall, and the wind was rising. Elizabeth, seeing nothing of what was going on outside, came to the window and drew the curtains. Then she went to the piano. Faintly to the ears of the men outside came the sound of her silvery voice singing.

"I must get away from here, Mac. I can't listen to her singing. I'm going away—don't keep me," for the policeman was holding fast to him, not roughly now, but lovingly, for he had known Dave from his sunny childhood.

"But, Dave, where would you go, your mother 'll take you in."

"Take in a fiend from hell, and introduce him there! Man I'm not fit for it. I didn't mean to let her see me, I tell you. I didn't mean to come near the house, but I found myself here before I knew it. I came as if I had walked in my sleep! No, McIntyre, I'm going off, and she must not know I'm alive. For the love of God, McIntyre, don't breath it to her."

"What are you going to do then?"

"I don't know—maybe drown myself—maybe go to the place where I belong with the father of lies."

"Faith, if you've no better plan than that, I'll arrist ye before I'll let you go to the river. I'll tell ye something better. Return to your mother, and confess your sin, and make a new start!"

"No, McIntyre, if ever I come back, I'll come as a man should, in open day, not skulking like a vagabond. Sometime I hope I can turn a new leaf. I don't know. I'll not take my life, old friend—no, and I'll not take that dollar. Put it back in your pocket. Shake hands and wish me luck, and promise me, as you fear God, you'll keep my secret. Tell nobody you've seen me, John McIntyre, for the love of heaven."

"I'll promise you, David, but come back, boy, come back all right. May God bless you, my boy."

Dave disappeared in the black night, and the policeman tramped sturdily on his beat.

HARD TO PLEASE

Regarding the Morning Cup.

"Oh how hard it was to part with coffee but the continued trouble with constipation and belching was such that I finally brought myself to leave it off.

Then the question was, what should we use for the morning drink? Tea was worse for us than coffee; chocolate and cocoa we soon tired of; milk was not liked very well, and hot water we could not endure.

About two years ago we struck upon Postum Food Coffee, and have never been without it since. We have seven children. Our baby now eighteen months old would not take milk, so we tried Postum and found she liked it and it agreed with her perfectly. She is today, and has been, one of the healthiest babies in the State. I use about two-thirds Postum and one-third milk and a teaspoon of sugar, and put it into her bottle. If you could have seen her eyes sparkle and hear her say "good" to-day when I gave it to her, you would believe me that she likes it.

If I was matron of an infants' home, every child would be raised on Postum. Many of my friends say, "You are looking so well!" I reply, "I am well; I drink Postum Food Coffee. I have no more trouble with constipation, and know that I owe my good health to God and Postum Food Coffee."

I am writing this letter because I want to tell you how much good the Postum has done us, but if you knew how I shrink from publicity, you would not publish this letter,—at least not over my name.—Milford, O.

Work Where Christ Tells You To

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Oct. 8. John 21: 1-6

HAPPY is the man who has found his true sphere in life. No lot is more pitiable than that of a man in a business for which he has no adaptability. Parents have no duty more responsible than that of settling for a boy what shall be his work in the world. If they choose unwisely, either their son goes through life manacled, or he separates himself from his uncongenial occupation and enters another without the preparation for its duties that he should have had. Every man has some natural talent which can be used to the best advantage in some particular sphere. In that one he will succeed; in any other he can never pass beyond mediocrity and is very likely to fail. The wise father watches his son's tastes and habits and tries to learn from them the bent of his mind and how his capacities can be best applied. Except in the case of a man so unfortunate as to have a son given up wholly to idleness and pleasure, he will help him to enter the career of his own choice. It is so, too, in the Lord's vineyard. There are many kinds of work needing to be done, and each calls for workers with special qualifications. He who desires to serve Christ must not suppose that he can serve him only in the pulpit or the foreign mission field. His true sphere may be in business, where he can show the graces of the Christian character and furnish the money for Christ's cause, which is as necessary as the laborers.

How is a man to know what his sphere is? It would disappoint many to give the pious, but indefinite answer, "Work where Jesus tells you to." Everyone knows that Jesus does not tell a man where he is to work. If he did, that would end all our difficulties, because there is no Christian young man—and it is with such we have here to do—who would disobey Jesus. Whatsoever Jesus told him to do, he would do and nothing else. Before all else is loyalty. Whether Christ calls us to honorable prominence or to humble obscurity, that is the place for us; but the difficulty is to know where and to what he does call. Many have made mistakes as to that call. As an eminent clergyman, who had much to do with young men who were studying for the ministry, used to quaintly say: "You have no idea how many youths butt their heads against the pulpit and stun themselves for life." Every denomination has among its preachers, in spite of all its precautions, and its examining boards, men who are unfitted for their vocation and who are, in extreme cases, mere cumberers of the ground. They have no spiritual message to give to their hearers, and if they had, would simply be inarticulate in the delivery of it. It is, therefore, possible to mistake ambition, or zeal for service, for a divine call. We are so apt to hear the voice calling us to the duty we wish to perform, that we mistake the inner voice for the voice of God.

It is safe to realize at the outset that for every man there is a work. When a soul comes to Christ, and receives from him his converting and transforming grace, that soul is to be used in his service. It is to be a light and a witness and a beacon. Christ is entitled to its best services. It belongs to him for time as well as for eternity. The consciousness of that fact ought to fill the being, and cause the man to ask anxiously and earnestly, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" When there is this readiness to accept direction, this willingness to be guided, intimation of Christ's will in the matter may be found in surrounding circumstances. Tentative work may be done as a means of learning Christ's will. A young man who thinks he is called to the ministry can give addresses at Sunday Schools and at missions, and can find out from their results whether there is a probability of his filling a larger sphere acceptably. He can have no surer proof of a divine call than that of seeing men converted under his speaking. Indeed, the church of Christ might wisely insist that no man shall enter her ministry until he can show such proof. But if the intimations of Providence are against the ministry, there are many other spheres in which valuable work can be done. In the Sunday School, in the dark places of our great cities, in every country neighborhood there are families who are strangers to Christ. Who can tell how quickly this whole world might be brought to Christ if every Christian in his own business were thoroughly in earnest in trying to serve Christ and win for him the souls within his circle of influence.

The Rock Lichens

SEE on the rocks the lichens grow,
As well when winds of autumn blow
As when the summer sunbeams glow;
In fiercest heat, in deepest snow,
The humble, hardy lichens grow.

No root to strike beneath the ground,
No stalk to cast its shade around;
One wondrous power the lichens bring,
And one alone, the power to cling!
Their mighty grasp thy rude hands mock;
They [illegible] the rock.

A lesson sweet the lichens give:
They teach earth's weak ones how to live;
So let me rest where naught can shock,
And grow by clinging to the Rock.

This cake of soap sent free for a 2-cent stamp

We have prepared 200,000 good-sized sample cakes for readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—all we ask of them is a stamp to pay the postage. We can only afford to make this offer because we know that if you value health and cleanliness you also consider how you get it. Read our statement below—no one else dares to expose the source of soap supplies.

HYOMEI Antiseptic Skin Soap

is a revelation to soap-users, and is made from the FRESH GREEN LEAVES OF THE TASMANIAN BLUE GUM TREE.

For ages you have never given it a thought, but [illegible] the base of all, from the commonest washing to the finest [illegible] combined with an alkali. To be sure, different grades of [illegible] are used, [illegible] medicament of some kind often added, but nine-tenths of every cake of soap made is composed of the above ingredients. In fact, it has always been thought that soap could not be made in any other way, and for this reason no physician has ever recommended the use of any soap for the skin. As a general thing, they are made from cheap fats and grease collected by street scavengers, and thrown out from houses in which all kinds of disease are prevalent; however of late most of the oils used come from incinerating plants now erected near all large cities where is burned the refuse collected from private houses, hotels and restaurants. Thousands of gallons are produced in this way every year, and being too cheap for other uses, is purchased almost exclusively by soap-makers. It is claimed that the heat used destroys all the germs of disease; but the medical profession assert the contrary, and state that the use of cheap soap accounts for most of the blotched and pimpled faces we see daily. One thing, at least, has been proved conclusively—that the dry and scaly skin with which so many persons are troubled is due to the use of alkali in soap. However true this may be, the thought of using such products daily is not a pleasant one, and the discovery of a method by which soap can be made without these dangerous ingredients will be hailed with delight by all.

Hyomei Antiseptic Skin Soap

[illegible] and the first one to be manufactured by the new process. Made from the fresh green leaves of the Tasmanian Blue Gum Tree, and containing all its fragrant, well-known healing and antiseptic qualities, this soap will be a revelation to users. As a skin food it has no equal. It acts not only as a cleanser and preventive of disease, but cures all cutaneous affections in a short time. It gives a rich, creamy lather, an invigorating and refreshing odor, and leaves the skin soft, white and velvety.

HYOMEI ANTISEPTIC SKIN SOAP is sold by all druggists. Price 25c. If your druggist does not keep it, we will send by mail on receipt of price. Don't forget our offer—send 2c stamp for postage and we will mail FREE sample cake.

Our Children's Home Closed

OUR Children's Fresh-Air Home has closed for the season of 1899. In spite of the summer joys that have been given there to our little guests—in fact, because of them—the closing of the Home is always an occasion of sadness. The children are loath to go, and we are loath to part with our little charges. Even the birds in the trees and the late flowers on the hillsides seem to miss the eager, happy throng who helped to make field and woodland merry and gay.

Many hundreds of little ones have been helped this summer, clothed, fed and re-established in health. Besides, we have the comfortable hope and belief that the work done has not only been a benefit to their bodies but to their immortal souls. Life-long impressions have been made upon numbers of the children while they were under our care and subject only to holy Christian influence; invaluable lessons of gentleness, kindness, faith and love have been learned, and many hundreds of tenement homes will be the better and happier because of the lessons. The burdens of hundreds of hard-working tenement mothers have been lightened through our care of the little ones whom we took from their over-crowded and poverty-stricken homes.

The petitions which pious people all over the Union have sent up for these children must surely bear fruit; and we believe that those who have prayed and those who have given to these little ones will reap an abundant reward, in the blessing of Him who said: "Suffer the little ones to come unto me."

Hundreds of letters testify that organized bodies of children and grown people—Christian Endeavors, Epworth Leagues, Sunday School workers and classes—remember the cause of the children of the poor before God's throne.

Jr. C. E. S., Reformed Church, Salina, Pa. $6. Pray it will make two children happy for ten days.—C. E. S., Metuchen, N. J. $4. Trusting God's blessing will rest upon the work.—C. E. S., Fairview, Neb. $1.60. God's blessing upon the children, the Home and the workers.

If You are a sufferer from disease in any form—if you have taken drugs and nostrums ad nauseum, you can find certain and permanent cure in the OXYDONOR. This is not faith nor theory, it is an accomplished fact attested to by thousands. This instrument cures all forms of disease, incipient or chronic, in Nature's own manner, by placing the body in a condition that assists in the absorption of oxygen, the great vitalizing force of this element is diffused throughout the system and disease is conquered. It simply cannot exist in an organization that appropriates oxygen in large quantities. The OXYDONOR is small, compact, and by merely applying it during sleep, a complete cure is effected. Send for our book of TRAVELLERS' REPORTS, containing hundreds of letters from clergymen, lawyers, business-men, etc., etc., who have been cured.

REV. THOS. J. OLIVER CURRAN, St. George's Church, 76th St. & Drexel Ave., Chicago, Ill., July 8th, 1899, writes:

"I have used the OXYDONOR on myself for Catarrh, Colds, Nervousness and Sleeplessness and found it to work like magic.

"I am positive from what I know it has done for myself and others, that it will do all you claim."

Yours sincerely, THOS. J. OLIVER CURRAN,
(In charge of St. George's Mission)

CAUTION! Imitations of OXYDONOR are dangerous to use. Refuse to accept them. Dr Sanche is the inventor and originator, and has obtained final decision in Supreme Court in Washington, D. C., against imitators. We are operating under the ONLY PATENTS that have been granted on THIS PROCESS and THESE INSTRUMENTS. Nothing can be gained or saved by purchasing spurious articles.

Send for prices. Our productions are selling rapidly in this country. We want persons in all sections to sell for us. Many giving only part of their time are making $100 to $200 per month. Others giving all their time are making much more.

OUR MAIL-BAG

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

M. E. K., Brooklyn, N. Y. Will you, in THE MAIL-BAG, please explain the circumstances of Secretary Seward's purchasing Alaska, and the price he paid for it?

The purchase of Alaska took place in 1867, the price being $7,200,000, and the extent of territory acquired 570,000 square miles. The negotiations were carried through by Secretary Seward in the face of considerable opposition. The facts are stated in all the standard American histories.

Hattie L., Anderson, Ark. What were the miracles said to have been performed by Patrick, the apostle to Ireland?

The story of his "miracles" is largely legendary. Rev. J. Sanderson, D.D., LL.D., in his book on the subject says "there is not the slightest reference in Patrick's own writings to any miracles ever having been wrought by him." Among other unauthenticated stories it is said he raised the dead horse of Daire to life at Tara, he made a dead man speak, he dried up an inundation with fire from his fingers, he kindled a fire with ice, and he changed butter into honey, passed through shut doors, converted flesh into fish, changed a savage king (Coroticus) into a fox, and many more of the same character—all being doubtless the invention of a monkish age which delighted in the supernatural.

T. A. M., Tualatin, Oreg. When men are unwilling to do God's will, are his purposes ever [illegible]

It is impossible to conceive of Omnipotence being thwarted or defeated by anything that mortal man can do. But, even supposing such a thing possible, the question could not be answered, unless God's purpose in the special matter at issue was absolutely known.

Mr. David Ross, missionary at Shathelair, N. S. [illegible]

At the Gospel services in the Northern Woods, a list of 202 names was made a subject of special prayer for the salvation of each.

E. F. V., Newbern, Va. Why did Christ's apostles carry swords?

They had, doubtless, armed themselves in anticipation of violence. Having heard the Master's prediction of approaching events, and knowing that he had already been betrayed and was in momentary danger of seizure, they had evidently prepared themselves for emergencies, being resolved to resist. Besides, there were some among them—probably a majority—who still clung to the belief that Christ's kingdom was to be a material kingdom, won by divinely aided force or stratagem and to be maintained by a display of authority. There is nothing in the Gospel narrative to warrant the inference that all or any of the apostles went about armed as a customary precaution, but rather that they had taken arms to defend the Master against his enemies in the final crisis.

Reader, Groton, N. H. If I should buy a farm and when I received my deed, the old deeds previously given were left with me and on looking them over I found a deed of a piece of land donated to a Christian church for a church site, and said lot was reserved in my deed and I should keep that deed, which was not recorded, while I knew that the trustees who had signed the articles of agreement and taken possession of said lot and built a chapel on it, and had lost the deed and were trying to find it but could not, what claim would the trustees have upon me if I refused to give up the deed to them and took the keys?

Such an act would be fraudulent, and a trained lawyer would probably have little difficulty in proving as much and in securing the property to its rightful owners, the church trustees. Witnesses might be found who were present at the execution of the original deed, now lost. It might require time to prove the case, but it could be done. But, knowing all the facts and recognizing the justice of the claim, it would seem to be the duty of the present holder to transfer the property anew and give the church the title to the land upon which it has built.

J. B., Manor Station, Pa. 1. Did Christ mean himself or did he allude to Nathaniel, when he said: "Behold an Israelite, indeed, in whom there is no guile"? 2. Also in the case of Peter: "Thou art Peter, and on this Rock will I build my church." Did Christ mean that he would build his church on Peter or on himself? 3. How does the Catholic church harmonize this saying with the claims of the Protestant church?

1. He refered to Nathaniel only. 2. It is generally believed that it was not Peter, but the statement Peter had just made, to which Christ had reference as the foundation of his future church. In the Aramaic or Syro-Chaldaic dialect used in our Lord's time, the words "Peter" and "rock" are identical. 3 Peter, in conjunction with his fellow-disciples, became the founders of the early Christian church. In the broadest sense, therefore, all branches of that church, of whatever denomination, can claim him equally with the Roman church, as their founder. The Papacy was not organized or developed until long generations afterward.

D. A. R. Can you give any information concerning the ancestors of Mary Ball the mother of George Washington?

[illegible] was daughter of Joseph Ball son of Colonel William Ball, a native of Kent, England, who came with his family to America in 165-, and settled in Lancaster county, Va. Colonel Ball was brother of John Ball, a preacher, in Woodstock, England, noted for his piety and learning. There is said to be evidence that these Balls were descendants of John Ball, the "Mad Preacher" and reformer, who was concerned in the Watt Tyler insurrection and beheaded in 1381, and of whom Green, the historian says, "In his preaching England first listened to the death-knell of feudalism and the declaration of the rights of man;" but we are unable to find the evidence, or to give fuller information concerning the Ball genealogy. You might write to the So. History Association, 933 R. I. Ave., Washington, D.C.

In a diving bell, the ordinary depth for working is not we believe, exceeding thirty or forty feet. 2. Seven hundred and twenty pounds.

Martin F., Dayton, O. When and by whom was the epithet, "Sick Man" first applied to Turkey?

AN INTERNATIONAL MARRIAGE.

THE marriage, September 25, in All Saints' Chapel, Newport, Bishop Potter, Rev. Dr. Nevins and Rev. Emory H. Porter officiating, of Miss Julia Dent Grant and Prince Michael Cantacuzene, of Russia, is a matter of national interest, the bride being Gen. Ulysses S. Grant's granddaughter and the daughter of Gen. Fred Grant, now on duty in the Philippines. The bridegroom is a lieutenant in the Russian Imperial Guards, and though only twenty-four, is the head of his house, an ancient and honorable one. The wife he sought is not the possessor of wealth, but she is a sweet-tempered, accomplished young woman of fine Christian character. The ceremony was twice performed, the first time according to the form of the Greek Church, as Russian law requires, by Rev. Hotovitsky and Rev. Sivitsky, of New York City. The benignant presence of Gen. Grant's widow added to the interest of the occasion. The marriage of our American girls with foreigners has some excellent features. With American wives and mothers across the water, wars with European countries are more improbable than if we had no American sentiment there.

Protestant, Brooklyn, N. Y. We do not agree with you that "the Protestant always gives in." Besides, the mere acquisition of wealth and title as allies does not add enduring strength to any spiritual or religious cause. Rome is always ready to announce with a flourish the annexation of some weak, wealthy worlding; but the emancipation of those who have emerged from the darkness and bondage and superstition which still envelop that system, into the light of a free and true Christianity is, of course, never discussed by that church or by its organs.

It is claimed, in ancient histories, that Anaximander (about 560 B. C.) drew the first map in the form of a disk, and that Democritus of Athens, some three hundred years afterward, made a map of the world in the form of an oblong. Is is, however, more than probable that mariners used some rude form of maps or charts much earlier than those dates. In all likelihood the earliest maps of all were used by the Phoenicians.

[illegible] Ostracism wa[illegible] denunciation in [illegible] as 500 B. C., hav[illegible] by Hippias, the tyrant. People wrote upon snail shells the names of those persons they suspected, and these shells were put in an urn or box and presented to the Senate. That body examined the shells, and he whose name was written most frequently, being judged as under general suspicion as an enemy of the state, was banished. Six thousand votes were needed upon which to base such official action. It will thus be seen that the term ostracism, as used to-day, bears the same interpretation, in a modified sense, as formerly, although the ostrakon (shell) is no longer used and the act itself is a social rather than an official one.

Mrs. A. S. L., Springfield, O. Is it true, as asserted by one of our leading journals in the State, that the United States, in a majority of its States and Territories labors under a disproportion of the sexes, as compared with European countries? What are the facts?

It is simply undergoing the same experience which every country that is still comparatively young has to undergo. The five U. S. censuses from 1850 to 1890 show an average of fifty-one per cent. males to forty-nine per cent. females in the entire population, while the proportions in foreign countries during the same period were relatively forty-nine per cent. males and fifty-one per cent. females. The excess of males has been continuous in the United States since 1850. Under normal conditions the balance is nearly equal, with the preponderance in favor of the female.

. . . Saving Lives in Porto Rico . . .

Gifts and Prayers Still Pouring in for the Relief of the Stricken Islanders—Letters of Sympathy from Many States

PORTO RICO and its afflicted people are not forgotten by benevolent Americans even in these days of jubilation over the return of the nation's greatest naval hero from the far East. This is evident from the many letters that continue to be received, containing contributions to the relief fund that have been consecrated by earnest prayer. Many of these letters are extremely touching, and show how near to the hearts of the writers this great work of Christian charity lies:

L. H. M., writes: "Here is $3 for the hungry Porto Ricans. I wish I could make it $3,000." "May God bless the noble work," is the prayer of Miss E. M. M., Hanover, N. J., in forwarding a gift of $10 from the Hanover Sunday School.

Minnie E. O., Brockton, Mass. ($2), writes:

Our children have been saving their pennies since the first of the year, but they each want to give half of what they have to the poor starving babies of Porto Rico. My husband is only a weekly wage earner, but I'm glad to spare a dollar for the babies.

"He who reads motives can multiply its use," writes J. H. O'N., in forwarding his contribution of $1. Mrs. Helen C. A., Lansing, Mich. ($1), writes: "Lord pity our suffering brothers and bless your efforts to help them." Pansy and Lucy A., Worcester, Mass. ($2), write: "We hasten to send this dollar to help a little. Mother wants us to send one for her also." "Seven Small Cousins" write from Pittsburg, Pa., with $7 "for the many poor children who are suffering in Porto Rico." "May God bless every giver and multiply the gifts!" is the fervent exclamation of Mrs. C. E. P., of Franklinville, N. Y.

A very sweet gift comes from B. F. S., East Rockaway, N. Y. ($1), with these words: "In the name of Jesus I give it, for what he has done for me, and what the Bible says to do unto others. May he add his blessing to it, as he did to the loaves and fishes when he fed the multitude."

M. E. B., Shawhan, Ky. ($5), writes: "You know the Divine One said 'Love one another,' and what is love but to give liberally and upbraid not? And when he gave himself for us, should we not give ourselves for others?"

These are examples of hundreds of other letters in the same earnest and benevolent tone.

Writing from San Juan to Mrs. Guy V. Henry, President of the Colonial Aid Society, U. S. A., Mrs. John Von R. Hoff, President of the Woman's Aid Society of Porto Rico, says:

"The relief work is perfectly systemized, and we are having seven hundred garments made a week now. We are buying and renting machines, paying rents, etc., which our poor women are paying back in work, one-half of their earnings being retained by us. You would be touched by these poor women asking for more clothes, when told they were making garments to be sent where the destitution is so great. Four hundred and thirty-two were given out this morning to be made, by which you may judge how the work is going on. The clothes are all made from unmade material sent in recent boxes from the United States.

"I only hope the dear people at home, who are doing so much for us, will realize the good they are doing, as well as feel fully satisfied with our disposition of their donations."

The following contributions to the relief work have been received:

A Noble Life-Work Ended

Miss Nancy Elliott, the Children's Friend, Who Spent Thirty-five Years of Her Life Teaching New York City Waifs

THERE is a vacant chair in the school room of the old Five Points Mission. Miss Nancy Elliott, who for thirty-five years had taught the little ones there, died Sept. 7 last, and was laid to rest in the rural cemetery at Kingston, N. Y. Her life was a beautiful one, devoted wholly to the service of others. Deeply impressed by religious truths in her early youth, she engaged in Sunday School work in a quiet Hudson River community. Events brought her to New York. She soon found a chance to build up a Sunday School. For several years she acted as superintendent, and when, one day during the Civil War, a friend and fellow-worker told her of the Five Points Mission, she paid it a visit. The sight of the poor little waifs, many of whom had been gathered from the very gutters of that neighborhood, so filled her heart with pity that she volunteered to teach a class during week days. It soon became a positive delight to instruct the children, to visit them at their squalid homes, and to gently influence their parents into paths of morality and self-help.

THE LATE MISS NANCY ELLIOTT

Miss Elliott, who was possessed of some means, was absorbed in her work. Into every garret and cellar of the surrounding district her sweet sympathy penetrated, leaving behind an influence for good that has borne fruit in a thousand ways. When her little substance had been spent, she lived at the Mission as a teacher and made it her sacred life-work. She passed away at 80, full of years and honors in the Master's service.

.. HEROES OF THE NAVY ..

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, James 3: 4: . . . . . Behold also the ships

If this exclamation was appropriate about eighteen hundred and seventy-two years ago, when it was written concerning [illegible] Lake Galilee, how much more appropriate in an age which has launched from the dry docks for purposes of peace the Oceanic of the White Star Line, the Lucania of the Cunard Line, the St. Louis of the American Line, the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse of the North German Lloyd Line, the Augusta Victoria of the Hamburg-American Line; and in an age which for purposes of war has launched the screw-sloops like the Idaho, the Shenandoah, the Ossipee, and our ironclads like the Kalamazoo, the Roanoke, and the Dunderberg, and those which have already been buried in the deep, like the Monitor, the Housatonic, and the Weehawken, the tempests ever since sounding a volley over their watery sepulchres; and the Oregon, and the Brooklyn, and the Texas, and the Olympia, the Iowa, the Massachusetts, the Indiana, the New York, the Marietta of the last war, and the scarred veterans of war shipping, like the Constitution, or the Alliance, or the Constellation that have swung into the naval yards to spend their last days, their decks now all silent of the feet that trod them, their rigging all silent of the hands that clung to them, their port holes silent of the brazen throats that once thundered out of them. If in the first century, when war vessels were dependent on the oars that paddled at the side of them for propulsion, my text was suggestive, with how much more emphasis and meaning and overwhelming reminiscence we can cry out, as we see the Kearsarge lay across the bows of the Alabama and sink it, teaching foreign nations they had better keep their hands off our American fight, or as we see the ram Albemarle of the Confederates running out and in the Roanoke, and up and down the coast, throwing everything into confusion as no other craft ever did, pursued by the Miami, the Ceres, the Southfield, the Sassacus, the Mattabesett, the Whitehead, the Commodore Hull, the Louisiana, the Minnesota, and other armed vessels, all trying in vain to catch her, until Captain Cushing, twenty-one years of age, and his men blew her up, himself and only one other escaping, and as I see the flag-ship Hartford, and the Richmond, and the Monongahela, with other gun-boats, sweep past the batteries of Port Hudson, and the Mississippi flows forever free to all Northern and Southern craft, and under the fire of Dewey and his men the Spanish ships at Manila burn or sink, and the fleet rushing out of Santiago harbor are demolished by our guns, and the brave Cervera surrenders, I cry out with a patriotic emotion that I cannot suppress if I would, and would not if I could, "Behold also the ships."

Full justice has been done to the men who at different times fought on the land, but not enough has been said of those who on ship's deck dared and suffered all things. Lord God of the rivers and the sea, help me in this sermon! So, ye admirals, commanders, captains, pilots, gunners, boatswains, sailmakers, surgeons, stokers, messmates and seamen of all names, to use your own parlance, we might as well get under way and stand out to sea. Let all land lubbers go ashore Full speed now! Four bells!

Never since the sea fight of Lepanto, where three hundred royal galleys, manned by fifty thousand warriors, at sunrise, September 6th, 1571, met two hundred and fifty royal galleys, manned by one hundred and twenty thousand men, and in the four hours of battle eight thousand fell on one side, and twenty-five thousand on the other; yea, never since the day when at Actium, thirty-one years before Christ, Augustus with two hundred and sixty ships scattered the two hundred and twenty ships of Mark Anthony, and gained universal dominion as the prize; yea, since the day when at Salamis the twelve hundred galleys of the Persians, manned by five hundred thousand men, were crushed by Greeks with less than a third of that force; yea, never since the time of Noah, the first ship captain, has the world seen such a miraculous creation as that of the American navy in 1861.

There were about two hundred available seamen in all the naval stations and receiving ships, and here and there an old vessel. Yet orders were given to blockade thirty-five hundred miles of sea coast, greater than the whole coast of Europe, and beside that the Ohio, Tennessee, Cumberland, Mississippi, and other great rivers, covering an extent of two thousand more miles, were to be patrolled. No wonder the whole civilized world burst into guffaws of laughter at the seeming impossibility. But the work was done, done almost immediately, done thoroughly, and done with a speed and consummate skill that eclipsed all the history of naval architecture. What brilliant achievements are suggested by the mere mention of the names of the rear admirals! If all they did should be written, every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. But these names have received the honors due. The most of them went to their graves under the cannonade of all the forts, navy yards, and men-of-war, the flags of all the shipping and capitals at half mast.

I recite to-day the deeds of our naval heroes, many of whom have not yet received appropriate recognition. "Behold also the ships." As we will never know what our national prosperity is worth until we realize what it cost, I recall the unrecited fact that the men of the navy in all our wars ran especial risks. They had not only the human weaponry to contend with, but the tides, the fog, the storm. Not like other ships could they run into harbor at the approach of an equinox, or a cyclone, or a hurricane, because the harbors were hostile. A miscalculation of a tide might leave them on a bar, and a fog might overthrow all the plans of wisest commodore and admiral, and accident might leave them not on the land ready for an ambulance, but at the bottom of the sea, as when in our Civil War the torpedo blew up the Tecumseh in Mobile Bay, and nearly all on board perished. They were at the mercy of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, which have no mercy. Such tempests as wrecked the Spanish Armada might any day swoop upon the squadron. No hiding behind the earthworks. No digging in of cavalry spurs at the sound of retreat. Mightier than all the fortresses on all the coasts is the ocean when it bombards a flotilla.

In the cemeteries for Federal and Confederate dead are the bodies of most of those who fell on the land. But where those are who went down in the war vessels will not be known until the sea gives up its dead. The Jack tars knew that while loving arms might carry the men who fell on the land, and bury them with solemn liturgy, and the honors of war, for the bodies of those who dropped from the ratlines into the sea, or went down with all on board under the stroke of a gun-boat, there remained the shark and the whale and the endless tossing of the sea which cannot rest. Once a year, in the decoration of the graves, those who fell in the land were remembered; but how about the graves of those who went down at sea? Nothing but the archangel's trumpet shall reach their lowly bed. A few of them were gathered into naval cemeteries of the land, and we every year garland the sod that covers them; but who will put flowers on the fallen crew of the exploded Westfield and Shawsheen, and the sunken Southfield, and the Winfield Scott? Bullets threatening in front, bombs threatening from above, torpedoes threatening from beneath, and the ocean, with its reputation of six thousand years for shipwreck, lying all around, am I not right in saying it required a special courage for the navy in 1863 as it required especial courage in 1898?

U. S. BATTLESHIP "KEARSARGE," THE NEWEST AND MOST POWERFUL OF OUR WAR-SHIPS

It looks picturesque and beautiful to see a war vessel going out through the Narrows, sailors in new rig singing,

> A life on the ocean wave,
> A home on the rolling deep!

the colors gracefully dipping to passing ships, the decks immaculately clean, and [illegible] that ship as it comes out of [illegible] ment, its decks red with human blood, wheel-house gone, the cabins a pile of shattered mirrors and destroyed furniture, [illegible] ed, a hundred pound Whitworth rifle shot having left its mark from port to starboard, the shrouds rent away, ladders splintered and decks ploughed up, and smoke-[illegible] gasp far away from home and kindred, whom they love as much as we love wife and parents and children.

Oh, men of the American Navy returned from Manila, and Santiago, and Havana, as well as those who are survivors of the naval conflicts of 1863 and 1864, men of the Western Gulf squadron, of the Eastern Gulf squadron, of the South Atlantic [illegible] Atlantic squadron, of the Mississippi squadron, of the Pacific squadron, of the West [illegible] Potilla, hear our thanks! Take the benediction of our churches. Accept the hospitalities of the nation. If we had our way, we would get you not only a pension, but a home, and a princely wardrobe and an equipage and a banquet while you live, and after your departure a catafalque and a mausoleum of sculptured marble, with a model of the ship in which you won the day. It is considered a gallant thing when in a naval fight, the flag-ship with its blue ensign goes ahead up a river or into a bay, its admiral standing in the shrouds watching and giving orders. But I have to tell you, O veterans of the American navy! if you are as loyal to Christ as you were to the government, there is a flag-ship sailing ahead of you, of which Christ is the admiral, and he watches from the shrouds, and the heavens are the blue ensign, and he leads you toward the harbor, and all the broadsides of earth and hell cannot damage you, and ye whose garments were once red with your own blood shall have a robe washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. Then strike eight bells! High noon in heaven!

While we are heartily greeting and banquetting the sailor patriots just now returned, we must not forget the veterans of the navy now in marine hospitals, or spending their old days in their own or their children's homesteads. Oh, ye veterans! I charge you bear up under the aches and weaknesses that you still carry from the war times. You are not as stalwart as you would have been but for that nervous strain and for that terrific exposure. Let every ache and pain, instead of depressing, remind you of your fidelity. The sinking of the Weehawken off Morris Island, December 6th, 1863, was a mystery. She was not under fire. The sea was not rough. But Admiral Dahlgren, from the deck of the flag steamer Philadelphia, saw her gradually sinking, and finally she struck the ground; but the flag still floated above the wave in the sight of the shipping. It was afterward found that she sank from weakness through injuries in previous service. Her plates had been knocked loose in previous times. So you have in nerve, and muscle, and bone, and dimmed eyesight, and difficult hearing, and shortness of breath, many intimations that you are gradually going down. It is the service of many years ago that is telling on you. Be of good cheer. We owe you just as much as though your life blood had gurgled through the scuppers of the ship in the Red River expedition, or as though you had gone down with the Melville off Hatteras. Only keep your flag flying, as did the illustrious Weehawken. Good cheer, my boys! The memory of man is poor, and all that talk about the country never forgetting those who fought for it is an untruth. It does forget. Witness how the veterans sometimes had to turn the hand organs on the street to get their families a living. Witness how ruthlessly some of them were turned out of office that some bloat of a politician might take their place. Witness the fact that there is not a man or woman now under forty-five years of age who has any full appreciation of the five years' martyrdom of 1861 to 1865, inclusive. But while men may forget God never forgets. He remembers the swinging hammock. He remembers the forecastle. He remembers the frozen ropes of that January tempest. He remembers the amputation without sufficient ether. He remembers the horrors of that deafening night when forts from both sides belched on you their fury, and the heavens glowed with ascending and descending missiles of death. He remembers it all better than you remember it, and in some shape reward will be given.

Sometimes off the coast of England the royal family have inspected the British navy, manœuvred before them for that purpose. In the Baltic Sea the Czar and Czarina have reviewed the Russian navy. To bring before the American people the debt they owe to the navy, I go out with you on the Atlantic Ocean, where there is plenty of room, and in imagination review the war shipping of our four great conflicts—1776, 1812, 1865 and 1898. Swing into line all ye frigates, ironclads, fire-rafts, gun-boats and men-of-war! There they come, all sail set, and all furnaces in full blast, sheaves of crystal tossing from their cutting prows. That is the Delaware, an old Revolutionary craft, commanded by Commodore Decatur. Yonder goes the Constitution, Commodore Hull commanding. There is the Chesapeake, commanded by Captain Lawrence, whose dying words were: "Don't give up the ship"; and the Niagara, of 1812, commanded by Commodore Perry, who wrote on the back of an old letter, resting on his navy cap: "We have met the enemy, and they are ours." Yonder is the flag-ship Wabash, Admiral Dupont commanding; yonder, the flag-ship Minnesota, Admiral Goldsborough commanding; yonder, the flag-ship Philadelphia, Admiral Dahlgren commanding; yonder, the flag-ship San Jacinto, Admiral Bailey commanding; yonder, the flag ship Black Hawk, Admiral Porter commanding; yonder, the flag steamer Benton, Admiral Foote commanding; yonder, the flag-ship Hartford, David G. Farragut commanding; yonder the Brooklyn, Rear-Admiral Schley commanding; yonder the Olympia, Admiral Dewey commanding; yonder the Oregon, Capt. Clarke commanding; yonder the Texas, Capt. Philip commanding; yonder the New York, Rear-Admiral Sampson commanding; yonder the Iowa, Capt. Robley D. Evans commanding.

And now all the squadrons of all departments, from smallest tug-boat to mightiest man-of-war, are in procession, decks and rigging filled with men who on the sea fought for the old flag ever since we were a nation. Grandest fleet the world ever saw! Sail on before all ages! Run up all colors! Ring all the bells! Yea, open all the port-holes! Unlimber the guns and load, and fire one great broadside that shall shake the continents in honor of peace and the eternity of the American Union! But I lift my hand, and the scene has vanished. Many of the ships have dropped under the crystal pavement of the deep, sea-monsters swimming in and out the forsaken cabin, and other old craft have swung into the navy yards, and many of the brave spirits who trod their decks are gone up to the Eternal Fortress, from whose casements and embrasures may we not hope they look down to-day with joy upon a nation in re-united brotherhood?

All those of you who were in naval service during the war of 1865 are now in the afternoon or evening of life. With some of you it is two o'clock, three o'clock, four o'clock, six o'clock, and it will soon be sundown. While in our Cuban war there were more Christian commanders on sea and land than in any previous conflict, I would revive in your minds the fact that at least two great Admirals of the Civil War were Christians, Foote and Farragut. Had the Christian religion been a cowardly thing they would have had nothing to do with it. In its faith they lived and died. In Brooklyn navy yard Admiral Foote held prayer-meetings and conducted a revival on the receiving ship North Carolina, and on Sabbaths, far out at sea, followed the chaplain with religious exhortation. The other Christian Admiral will be honored on earth until the day when the fires from above shall lick up the waters from beneath, and there shall be no more sea.

Oh, while old ocean's breast
Bears a white sail,
And God's soft stars to rest
Guide through the gale
Men will him ne'er forget,
Old heart of oak
Farragut, Farragut—
Thunderbolt stroke!

According to his own statement, Farragut was very loose in his morals in early manhood, and practiced all kinds of sin. One day he was called into the cabin of his father, who was a ship master. His father said, "David, what are you going to be, anyhow?" He answered, "I am going to follow the sea." "Follow the sea," said the father, "and be kicked about the world and die in a foreign hospital?" "No," said David; "I am going to command like you." "No," said the father; "a boy of your habits will never command anything," and his father burst into tears and left the cabin. From that day David Farragut started on a new life.

When in Mobile Bay the monitor Tecumseh sank from a torpedo, and the great warship Brooklyn that was to lead the squadron turned back, he said he was at a loss to know whether to advance or retreat, and he says, "I prayed, 'O God, who created man and gave him reason, direct me what to do. Shall I go on?' And a voice commanded me, 'Go on,' and I went on." Was there ever a more touching Christian letter than that which he wrote to his wife from his flag-ship Hartford? "My dearest wife, I write and leave this letter for you. I am going into Mobile Bay in the morning, if God is my leader, and I hope he is, and in him I place my trust. If he thinks it is the proper place for me to die, I am ready to submit to his will in that as all other things. God bless and preserve you, my darling, and my dear boy, if anything should happen to me. May his blessings rest upon you and your dear mother."

Cheerful to the end, he said on board the Tallapoosa in the last voyage he ever took, "It would be well if I died now in harness." The sublime Episcopal service for the dead was never more appropriately rendered than over his casket, and well did all the forts of New York Harbor thunder as his body was brought to the wharf, and well did the minute guns sound and the bells toll as in a procession having in its ranks the President of the United States and his cabinet, and the mighty men of land and sea, the old admiral was carried amid hundreds of thousands of uncovered heads on Broadway, and laid on his pillow of dust in beautiful Woodlawn, September 30th, amid the pomp of our autumnal forests.

But just as much am I stirred at the scene on war-ship's deck before Santiago last summer, when, the victory gained for our American flag over Spanish oppression, the Captain took off his hat, and all the sailors and soldiers did the same, and silently they offered thanks to Almighty God for what had been accomplished, and when on another ship the soldiers and sailors were cheering as a Spanish vessel sank, and its officers and crews were struggling in the waters, and the Captain of our war-ship cried out, "Don't cheer! The poor fellows are drowning." Prayers on deck! Prayers in the forecastle! Prayers in the cabin! Prayers in the hammocks! Prayers on the look-out at midnight! The battles of that war opened with prayer, were pushed on with prayer, and closed with prayer, and to-day the American nation recalls them with prayer.

We hail with thanks the new generation of naval heroes, those of the year 1898. We are too near their marvelous deeds to fully appreciate them. A century from now poetry, and sculpture and painting and history will do them better justice than we can do them now. A defeat at Manila would have been an infinite disaster. Foreign nations not over-fond of our American institutions would have joined the other side, and the war so many months past would have been raging still, and perhaps a hundred thousand graves would have opened to take down our slain soldiers and sailors. It took this country three years to get over the disaster at Bull Run at the opening of the civil war. How many years it would have required to recover from a defeat at Manila in the opening of the Spanish war I cannot say. God averted the calamity by giving triumph to our navy under Admiral Dewey, whose coming up through the Narrows of New York Harbor day before yesterday was greeted by the nation whose welcoming cheers will not cease to resound until to-morrow; and next day in the Capital of the nation the jeweled sword voted by Congress shall be presented amid booming cannonade, and embannered hosts, and our autumnal nights shall become a conflagration of splendor, but the tramp of these processions, and the flash of that sword, and huzza of that greeting, and the roar of those guns, and the illumination of those nights will be seen and heard as long as a page of American history remains inviolate. Especially let the country boys of America join in these greetings to the returned heroes of Manila. It is their work. The chief character in all the scene is the once country lad, George Dewey. Let the Vermonters come down, and find him older, but the same modest, unassuming almost bashful person that they went to school with and with whom they sported on the play-ground. The honors of all the world cannot spoil him. A few weeks ago at a banquet in England, some of the titled noblemen were affronted because our American minister-plenipotentiary associated the name of Dewey with that of Lord Nelson. As well might we be affronted because the name of Nelson is associated with that of our most renowned Admiral. The one name in all the coming ages will stand as high as the other. So this day, sympathizing with all the festivities and celebrations of the past week, and with all the festivities and celebrations to come this week, let us anew thank God, and those heroes of the American navy who have done such great things for our beloved land. Come aboard the old ship, Zion, ye sailors and soldiers, whether still in the active service or honorably discharged and at home having resumed citizenship. And ye men of the past, your last battle on the seas fought, take from me in God's name, salutation and good cheer. For the few remaining fights with sin and death and hell make ready. Strip your vessel for the fray; hang the sheet chains over the side. Send down the top-gallant masts. Barricade the wheel. Rig in the flying jib-boom. Steer straight for the shining shore, and hear the shout of the great Commander of earth and heaven as he cries from the shrouds, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the Paradise of God." Hosanna! Hosanna!

THE LITTLE CHURCH IN THE GROVE

How a Pioneer Gospel Work in Wisconsin was Begun and How it Has Prospered

PEOPLE who live in the towns and cities have little conception of the privations and inconveniences of life in the newly settled districts of some of our Western states. Not the least among the inconveniences to which dwellers in those distant sections are subjected is the deprivation of church privileges. It may be that a family which has been accustomed to live in the East has lately come to the new district, where it shares with other families all the discomforts of a pioneer experience. There is no school for the little folks within many miles; the preacher's visits are like those of angels, "few and far between." A church is unknown until such time as the residents, having put their heads together for the spiritual good of the little community, decide to make sacrifice for the sake of having a place of worship for themselves. It is to such young and needy neighborhoods that the American Sunday School Union, with its consecrated workers, its Gospel literature and its inspiring record of church and Sunday School planting, comes like a veritable blessing. The story of the founding of many such churches has at different times, in past years, been described in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A typical case of this character is that of the good people of Foskett's Corners, a beautiful grove in a section of Crawford County, the hill country of Wisconsin. They had expressed a desire to have a church, and invited Rev. J. M. Crowell, Missionary Secretary of the American Sunday School Union, and several other gentlemen, to come and help them in the work of organization. After the service an organization was soon effected, twenty-four persons joining the new church on confession of faith. Several had in previous years been members of evangelical churches, but there were not a few who had not been inside of the Lord's house for many years. One who was present on this occasion writes:

A SAW-MILL SUNDAY SCHOOL — THE LITTLE CHURCH AT MAPLE RIDGE

"It was most touching and delightful to see the joy and gladness with which they came to renew their vows of allegiance to their Saviour, and their delight in the prospect of having a church within their reach once more. They seemed like exiles coming home; like wandering sheep glad to get within the fold again."

This organization was only the initial step, however. Now, the good people of that section, encouraged by the workers of the American Sunday School Union, have erected for themselves a pretty little church, which is shown in the photograph on this page. The congregation has doubled in numbers and the whole work is in a flourishing condition. It is under the care of the resident pastors of two denominations, but is kept undenominational. There are well-attended regular weekly prayer-meetings, a Christian Endeavor Society, Women's Societies and a Missionary Band. Such is the story of the founding of the little church in the Wisconsin grove, and it is a type of hundreds of others.

Esther Pleading for Her People

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 15. Esther 8: 3-17
Golden Text, Psalms 37: 5

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE deep grief of Mordecai, his sackcloth, ashes, and exceeding bitter cry, could not escape the notice of queen Esther; her maidens and her chamberlains told her of Mordecai's mourning, and the queen was "exceedingly grieved, and she sent raiment to clothe him and to take away his sackcloth from him, but he received it not." The burden of the Lord and of his people lay on his heart; no human sympathy could help him; help must come "from the Lord, which made heaven and earth" (Ps. 121: 2). But although the posts, which were sent out by Haman to decree the extermination of the Jews, "went forth in haste by the king's command ment; and the decree was given out in Shushan the palace," and though "the city of Shushan was perplexed," yet evidently Esther knew nothing of the matter.

But things had come to a crisis, and Esther could no longer remain in ignorance of the fate awaiting her people. She called "for Hatach, one of the king's chamberlains, whom he had appointed to attend upon her," and charged him to go to Mordecai, to know what this was and why it was.

Mordecai sent the queen by Hatach a copy of the decree against the Jews, and told him to charge her that she should go in unto the king to make supplication unto him, and to make request before him for her people. What! was the cause of the entire people of the Lord in the province of Babylon to rest on her? She shrank back. How could she—how dare she take such a responsibility? Nothing is so crushing as a deep sense of responsibility, when our eyes are open to see what for the souls and for the bodies of men may depend upon us in a critical moment; it would be unendurable if we did not know that the living God were with us. Esther must know that God was on her side, or she would break down under the burden.

It did not cost the queen very much to be gentle, and polite to everyone, but it might cost her life to stand between her husband, the king, and her people. What if she should fail? What if she should lose her life and yet not benefit them? She sent a message to Mordecai by Hatach, to explain the difficulties that lay in the way. It was a known fact, that no woman from the harem dare approach the king uncalled, on pain of death. The inner court of the palace was inaccessible, on account of this command. Only a slight chance of life remained for her who was bold enough to venture: the king might hold out the golden sceptre, which meant life. "But I," said the queen, "have not been called for thirty days." Humanly speaking, the chances were small for Esther. Was she ready to lay down her life for her people? No one else could approach the king: she alone of her race had his favor: everything depended upon her. Would she go forward depending upon God?

Her words were told to Mordecai, and he returned answer. Everything was at stake. Esther must be awakened to the full meaning of the situation. In almost merciless truthfulness Mordecai sent word to Esther, "Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house more than all the Jews. For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall relief and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place, but thou and thy father's house shall perish." Mordecai knew God. He had committed his way unto the Lord, and he knew that he would bring it to pass (Ps. 37: 5). But how the deliverance would come, and by whom, wou'd depend on Esther rising fully to the occasion. Mordecai was sure in his God, and he could be relentless with the queen. Esther, who art thou? A daughter of Abraham. As such, "who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" A daughter of Abraham lives for her God and for her people. Doubt not thy God, young queen; he calls thee to stand with him in this matter.

And Esther did not disappoint the expectations of Mordecai. Awake at last to the full solemnity of the moment, she called on Mordecai and the Jews in Shushan to solemnize a three days' fast, and she and her maidens would do the same, and thus strengthened, she would take the risk and go in unto the king uncalled. And she said, "If I perish, I perish: I offer my life for my people." Oh, how good it is, in a critical moment, to give time for prayer and reflection! How many a right thing has been spoiled by being done too soon, before God had fully prepared the way! During her three days' fast, Esther had seen how to lay her plans, and that she was not to present her petition at the first moment. So on the third day, Esther put on her royal apparel, and went and stood in the inner court, within sight of the king as he sat upon his throne. Did God give her calm as she stood there with her life in her hand? Surely yes. And the king held out the golden sceptre and said, "What wilt thou?"

Something in the very boldness and confidence of Esther pleased the king. She found favor in his sight, and, holding out the sceptre, which she touched, he said: "What wilt thou, Queen Esther, and what is thy request?" It shall be given thee, even to the half of my kingdom." And the queen saw that prayer had not been in vain. The God of Israel had been at work, and in the king's answer she had already the pledge of the salvation of the Jews. But God gave her wisdom. While Haman lived, evil would be brewing; this foe must be dealt with. Therefore she made a preliminary request that the king and Haman should come to the banquet which she had prepared for them, and on that occasion her full request should be made.

Haman's success seemed to be at its fullest height: and yet the erect figure of the unbending Mordecai sitting in the king's gate poisoned all his joy. While this man stood in his way and despised him he was mortified: and his ambition could not be wholly satisfied while he boasted to his friends of all his glory, and of the queen's invitation, he said, "All this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai, the Jew, sitting at the king's gate."

POETIC retribution so complete as that described in the book of Esther, is not often met with in history. Never did a wicked plot prove a more effective boomerang. It is easy to understand why the book has ever been popular with the Jews. A long experience of relentless persecution, now in one land, now in another, taught them to recognize all the rest of mankind as their enemies. Their history is one of cruel suffering. A story that told how a plot for their utter destruction recoiled on the heads of the plotters, appealed to their natural resentment and in many a dark hour it has shed lurid sunshine on their misery. But it is a shocking story from a Christian standpoint. We read with horror how seventy-five thousand persons, including "little ones and women" were murdered in one day. We may hope that the Greek version of the book, which places the number at fifteen thousand, may have been nearer the truth. Then to read of the Jews after this work of slaughter not regretting the awful necessity which had compelled it, but feasting and rejoicing, produces a feeling of disgust. Even the beautiful young queen, whose courage and devotion excited our admiration when she took her life in her hand to plead for her people, sinks in our esteem, when at the end of the first day's massacre, in reply to the king's offer of further favors, she pleaded for another day of killing. This is a terrible woman whose vindictiveness seems to us unnatural and repulsive. But it must not be forgotten that the slaughter was done in self-defense. The Jews were authorized "to stand for their lives" and to slay those who would assault them. The strife was not of their seeking and they meted out to their enemies only the fate designed for themselves. But one wishes Mordecai had not inserted that phrase in his edict, "both little ones and women." Surely, in a stand for self-defense, it was not necessary to kill them. But the Jew did not profess to love his enemy and he has been so wronged and oppressed almost everywhere, that we cannot wonder at his [illegible] still, the Jews [illegible] that they were the people of God and therefore we would have been glad if they had set a better example to their neighbors. It was a horrible time in which the deed was done, a period of license and cruelty and misgovernment. We have reason to be thankful that we live in a better age, when Christian principles have humanized and civilized the world.

Esther the Queen and Mordecai the Jew. According to tradition the two are buried together. Mrs. Bishop, the famous traveler, found at Hamadan, in Persia, a very old mausoleum which is reputed to be the resting place of their bodies. It is impossible to verify the legend, but it is believed by the Jews and it is certain that the tomb is an ancient one. A Russian writer tells of an aged Jew who took pity on a poor orphan boy of his own race, and adopted him and educated him. His own sons were angry at the favor shown the little waif and feared that their father would make him a joint heir with themselves. But the father was content with giving him a first-rate education and did not leave him anything in his will. The boy became a physician and not only did he relieve the suffering of his own race, but by curing the governor of the province of a malignant disease, won his favor and secured for the Jews the good-will of the government.

To reverse the letters. Not even the king, absolute as he was, could do this. The order must be carried out and could not be reversed. The only way to undo the mischief was to aid the Jews in defending themselves. It is so in life. Many a man who has done a wrong thing in his youth would give his right hand to undo it, but finds it utterly irremediable. Perhaps it has ruined some loved one, or has caused a death, or has left on his own soul an ineffaceable stain. The letters of past sin cannot be reversed. Young people cannot too early learn the lesson that sin is always loss. God in his mercy may forgive it, but the sinner never loses the stain of it. The writer knew a young man who was a defaulter. He crossed the ocean and in his new home he was converted. His first act was to send back every cent that he had left of his stolen money. Then he worked hard and saved until he had enough to make up the deficiency with interest. This he carried back to his employers whom he had robbed. Having made full restitution, he went to his home to see his father and mother. What was his horror to find his father a paralytic! The shock of his son's shame had caused him to have a stroke and he was then a wreck of what he had been. To see that fine old man, helpless as a child with no hope of recovery, was a bitter punishment to the son in spite of his reform. Those letters of shame and heartfelt sorrow could not be reversed.

The Saloon-keeper's Money

LETTERS, in almost overwhelming numbers, continue to discuss with intense, prayerful and thoughtful earnestness the question: Shall a church accept a saloon-keeper's money in aid of its spiritual work? From every side the problem is being carefully considered, and we believe that great good will result from this discussion:

J. W. Lockhart, Washington, writes:

We cannot solve each and every problem by an ironclad rule. If the "saloon keeper's gift" is intended to have the effect of "hush-money" on either the pastor or congregation, as it too often is—no. The vilest saloon-keeper is human and may have a soft spot somewhere in his heart, and the gracious acceptance of a gift, proffered under a conviction of sin, might lead to good results, aside from the direct use to which the money could be put. To churlishly refuse a gift so offered would naturally harden the sinner's heart and turn him away from the way of salvation. The responsibility for a lost soul is, in such a case, greater than any church ought to assume.

R. C. Salyer, Colo., writes:

No; if the church accepts the saloon-keeper's gift, it will in a measure make him believe that his business is not so bad as it is made out to be; while, on the other hand, refusal of this gift brings down convict on on him. I believe you will reach his heart quicker by rejection than acceptance. Cain offered an unrighteous offering and it was not accepted of God; Abel offered a holy offering which God accepted. God wants holy offerings.

Elizabeth B. Hadley, Pres. Y.W.C.T.U., Woonsocket, R. I., writes:

A church that maintains its rightful attitude toward the saloon will seldom have occasion to be troubled by contributions from same.

It is only those churches that are silent upon the saloon question that are likely to receive any contribution from the saloon. And for that silence God is holding them responsible.

Lawton E. Singer, Y.M.C.A., Colo., writes:

Jesus taught, "Love thy neighbor as thyself," and should we consider this question from that standpoint, instead of saying, "Down with the saloon-keeper," it will put a different aspect on the case. When a saloon-keeper offers money to the church, it shows that there is in his heart a desire to do the right, however feeble, and a faint spark of hope for the future, and to crush it out by flinging his money in his face would not be Christian or Christ-like. The motive that prompts the gift is between God and himself. Show him that while we despise his business, yet we love him and want to get him saved.

Mary A. Baker, New York, writes:

Can the church, with his gift in her hand, tell the saloon-keeper he is keeping a human slaughter house? Years ago, in the office of the manager of a dangerous railroad, a newspaper man, acknowledging a special courtesy, expressed the intention of saying a kind word for the road. The manager replied, "All we want is silence." A journey over the road explained the reply. There were signs of wrecks its entire length. The church that takes money from the saloon-keeper for its work will not want to make aggressive, or be able to make defensive, war against the saloon.

F. C. A., Roseland, N. C., writes:

Yes, without a question of a doubt. The Hebrews spoiled the Egyptians and the spoils were used in building the tabernacle. When the Jews returned from the seventy-years' captivity, they took a large sum of heathen money, which was expended in rebuilding the temple. Did not the Apostles receive the contributions of Ananias? The money he has belongs to the wives and children; shall not the church return it to them if she has the opportunity? Shall the church inquire of every giver: "How was this money obtained."

H. C. Kellogg, Iowa, writes:

Take every dollar he will contribute and pray God to so influence his heart as to give his entire receipts for charitable and Christian work. How can we distinguish between saloon and anti-saloon money? On Saturday night the saloon man pays his grocery bill. On Sunday the grocery man gives it to the Lord for church work. Is there a taint on that money? Should it be rejected? By no means.

H. W. Burton, Texas, writes:

No, it would not be right for a church to accept money from a whiskey-seller: as well accept his whiskey if he offered it.

Mrs. R. A. Sipes, Pennsylvania, writes:

Had the money a voice it would cry out, "Rescue me from the saloon-keepers' till and from the inebriates' fingers." By accepting his gift you may win the saloon-keeper and his household for Christ. Heathen darkness is no greater than the spiritual darkness of a man that will put the cup to his neighbors' lips. The Holy Spirit would say, "Win him from such an occupation if you can. Give him and the world Bibles in exchange for whiskey money."

Stephen Breed, New Hampshire, writes:

I do not see how any man can be engaged in the saloon business and have any interest in the work of the church; hence I conclude that his donations to the church are for the protection of his business, and he expects the church that accepts his gifts not to do anything to retard his sales. I do not see how any church can have any other understanding of such gifts; and if it accepts them, it is bound, by the obligation of honesty it should teach, not to interfere with his business.

A. L. L., Kattellville, N. Y., writes:

No; do not take the saloon-keeper's money. He who required that the sacrifice should be without blemish, would regard such money as an insult.

Mrs. R. A. Stevens, Illinois, writes:

Money is the nation's medium of exchange; it represents energy and industry in the first place, and is not at all responsible for the base uses to which it is often put. Is it wise to refuse to use it in doing good because it has passed through the hands of men who have done evil with it?

W. W. Smith, M.D., Welleston, S. C., writes:

No. Never accept one cent from the saloon for the support of the Gospel. Being very old and near my end, I wish to put on record my name before I go hence. Countenance from the people of God strengthens the rum-seller's cause. I am eighty-six years old and have been engaged in a perpetual war with the whiskey traffic sixty years of that time.

E. B. McPhetridge, Calif., writes:
